The decision of the trial court upon any general cause of challenge is not subject to exception or review upon appeal.

Where a witness failed to appear at the trial of the cause, but had previously, either on a former trial or at the preliminary examination of the accused, given evidence in the cause and the defendant had had an opportunity to cross-examine him, his deposition, or proof of the testimony given by him, can be admitted as evidence. To receive such evidence does not conflict with the provisions of article 6 of the Constitution of the United States or the Constitutions of the several States giving the accused the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him, or to meet them face to face.

Beatty, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was charged with the offense of resisting an officer. From the judgment rendered upon his conviction thereof he has appealed to this court, and now contends that the trial court erred (1) in admitting as a trial juror a person "who was a member of an organization that taught . . . its adherents . . . to commit the crime of bigamy or polygamy;" and (2) in admitting as evidence before the trial jury the depositions of witnesses taken before the committing magistrate.

Must the juror have all the qualifications of an elector? Whether a juror must have the same qualifications now required of an elector is the question involved in the first assignment of error. Sections 8941, 8942, Rev. Stat., together provide that jurors must be citizens of the United States, and electors of the county. Sections 500, 501, require that electors, besides having certain qualifications, must not be members of any "organization which teaches its adherents to commit the crime of bigamy or polygamy." While these Statutes seem clearly to exclude as jurors all persons who belong to such "organization," it is contended such a construction will do violence to the legislative will and intention, for which the reasons following are assigned: (1) that when the law first provided a juror should be an elector (Laws 8th Sess. p. 704) the only qualifications of an elector were citizenship and residence, and, in changing the qualifications of electors (13 Sess. p. 106) by requiring they must not belong to said organization, it was not designed to apply this restriction to jurors also; (2) that, if jurors must have all the qualifications of electors, they must also be registered, which, under the operation of the Registration Law, would often result in the temporary exclusion of good citizens as jurors, who are otherwise qualified electors; and (3) that in some counties in this Territory so many of the people are members of such organization that the courts would thus practically be without jurors.

1. The authorities holding that statutes will not be repealed by implication are not applicable to general laws which are in conflict with, and repugnant to, each other. When a general law is in apparent conflict with some prior private or special Act, passed for the benefit of some particular interest or municipality, the presumption is indulged that it was not designed by the general to repeal the special law; but no such presumption is entertained in the case of conflicting General Statutes. They cannot stand together. There can be no question that the two Statutes prescribe different qualifications for electors, and the older must yield to the later. It may be added that the Act of the 13th Session was an Election Law, and by its last section it not only expressly repealed the former law on the same subject, but also "all Acts or parts of Acts in conflict with this Act," which must be held to exclude any presumption that the Legislature did not intend the repeal of all conflicting statutes. However, the fact that on the 11th day of January, 1887, the Legislature by one Act swept out of existence all former legislation and laws of Idaho, and enacted a complete revision thereof, now embodied in our Revised Statutes, including sections 8941, 8942, as they now are, is sufficient answer to all suggestions that the Legislature did not intend the Statutes as they now read. One of the prime objects of a revision is the elimination of doubt. What is included therein must be construed together as the law, and all that formerly existed, and is not included, is clearly repealed. § 19, Rev. Stat.

2. It is not conceded an elector must be registered to act as a juror. Section 500 says he must be registered to vote. It does not follow that, if he has all the qualifications of an elector, he must be registered to sit in the jury box. Registration does not go to his qualification, but is only a precaution to prevent fraud in the election. But, even if the law should be construed that a juror must be registered, it would generally result in only a few being temporarily debarred the privilege of jurors.

3. It is, unfortunately, true that in some counties such a large proportion of the people belong to said "organization" that juries cannot be selected from the mass of the people, and courts may at times find it even inconvenient to procure them. So, also, communities might be found where the (5) qualification of citizenship, or any other general qualification, might result in the same inconvenience. On the contrary, we think the Legislature meant to exclude from jury service those belonging to the so-called "Mormon Church." By section 501 they are distinctly enjoined from "holding any position or office of honor, trust or profit." Laws are construed in the light of the facts and circumstances under which enacted. We are justified in supposing the law-maker took notice of the generally admitted fact that the members of that church are more obedient to its teachings, which are antagonistic to the laws of the land, than to the latter. View this question in any light, we are forced to the conclusion that under our laws a juror must have all the qualifications now required of an elector, and that the court should have excluded the juror objected to by appellant. That this conclusion will lead to inconvenience in some localities may be true, but we cannot change what seems to be a positive and clear statute. If there is any need of a change, we respectfully refer it to the legislative department.

Exception to Order Overruling Challenge for General Cause.

Respondent insists, however, that, even if the juror was not qualified, the Statute does not allow appellant an exception to the order of the court overruling his challenge to such juror. Inconsistent as it may appear, it seems such is the Statute. Section 7331 divides causes of challenge to jurors into (1) general, including "a want of any of the qualifications prescribed by law to render a person a competent juror" (7832), and (2) particular, which includes implied and actual bias (7833).

The cause of challenge in this case was a general cause; and the Statute in no place provides for or allows an exception to an order overruling such a cause of challenge. Our section 7940 (Penal Code Cal. § 1170) allows exceptions only in matters of challenge based on implied or actual bias. Here, then, we have a statute which declares a juror disqualfied, but provides no remedy to the aggrieved party when the court admits him. On the principle that there is a remedy for all wrongs, we would be inclined to hold that such action of the court is reviewable. But our Statute on this subject is an exact copy of that of California, and in adopting their laws we adopt also their construction of them. Partially in point is the case of People v. Riley, 65 Cal. 107, and cases cited, which hold that a defendant is not allowed an exception to the ruling of the court disallowing a "challenge for actual or implied bias," because the Statute makes no provision for such exception, but only allows it to the decision of the court "in admitting or rejecting testimony, or in charging the triers in the trial of a challenge to a juror for actual bias." Rev. Stat. § 7940 (Penal Code Cal. § 1170).

The direct question is decided in People v. Fong Ah Sing, 70 Cal. 8-11, being a cause in which defendant was found guilty of murder. A juror who was not a resident of the county, as required by law, was admitted against defendant's challenge. On appeal it was held this was a general cause of challenge, to rulings in which no exception is allowed. The case seems approved in People v. Ward, 77 Cal. 118. We therefore hold the appellant's exception to the order of the court overruling his challenge to the juror is not well taken.

Depositions may be Used on the Trial.

Was it error to admit in evidence the depositions referred to in the cause? Appellant claims it was, because not permitted by the Statute, and contrary to the Constitution of the United States. Under the common law, the depositions of witnesses, taken in the presence of the defendant, could be used at the trial of the cause in case of the death or absence of the witness, but it seems they could not be used before the grand jury. Does our Statute abrogate the common-law rule, or prohibit the use of depositions? Sections 7576 and 7634 provide for the taking of the depositions, and their use before the grand jury. It seems probable these provisions were designed to procure the testimony of witnesses while it is fresh in their minds, and also in the interest of economy and convenience. The question of testimony before the trial jury was not under consideration. The two questions are not sufficiently relevant that the consideration of one necessarily involves the other. It is evident this legislation referred only to the use of such evidence before the grand jury; for it provides for its use even when the presence of the witness can be procured, which is never permitted in the use of such testimony before the trial jury. The subjects not being relevant, failure to provide for its use before the trial jury does not operate to exclude it. Our Statutes expressly establish and recognize the principle of the use of depositions on the trial in certain cases of the absence or death of the witness. §§ 7588, 8161.

Then why not in all cases, if not expressly forbidden?

Section 8161 provides expressly for the taking of depositions of defendant's witnesses for use on the trial, and the fact that no provision is made therein for taking the deposition of the people's witnesses strongly suggests that it was designed they should not be used. But it does not appear we have abolished the common-law rule on this subject, nor have we directly enjoined the use of such testimony; and it does appear that all the depositions above referred to are taken in the same way, in the presence of the accused, thus justifying the presumption of a like use of all so taken; and section 7864 provides that "the rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions, except as otherwise provided in this Code." There is no doubt this is a question relating to "the rules of evidence," nor is there that depositions may be used in civil actions. We think our Statute permits their use before the trial jury when duly taken in the defendant's presence, and the witnesses cannot, for good cause, be brought before the court.

The Use of Depositions not Forbidden by United States Constitution.

It remains to consider whether article 6 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, providing that the accused must be "confronted with the witnesses against him," absolutely requires the presence of the witnesses at the trial. This question has been discussed time after time in the courts of the States having the same or similar constitutional provisions; and, while the decisions have not been uniform in their conclusions, the weight of authority is that depositions taken in the presence of the defendant, with the right of cross-examination, is being "confronted by the witnesses," and meets the demands of the Constitution. Such depositions have been admitted when it appeared the witness was dead. If constitutional in such case, the same justification can be urged for their use in case of absence of the witness. Of the many authorities sustaining this view are State v. McO'Brien, 24 Mo. 412, a murder case, in which depositions were allowed notwithstanding a constitutional provision that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused has the right to meet the witnesses against him face to face."

Summons v. State, 5 Ohio St. 340, was a murder case. The constitutional provision was: "In any trial, in any court, the party accused shall be allowed . . . to meet the witnesses face to face." The testimony of a witness given in a former trial was permitted to be testified to by those who heard it, the witness having in the mean time died. To same effect are Gilbreath v. State, 26 Tex. App. 818; Sneed v. State, 47 Ark. 180, and numerous authorities.

Had the depositions been improperly admitted, the appellant has failed to furnish the court with such a record as will authorize it to correct the error. Section 8236 is: "Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this Code in respect to any pleading or proceeding, nor an error or mistake therein, renders it invalid, unless it has actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right."

The appellant has entirely failed to show us he was prejudiced in the least by the alleged error of permitting the use of the depositions. That the court may judge whether they were detrimental to appellant, he should have brought them here, which he has failed to do.

It is not enough for appellant to show error. He must, under our Statute, show damaging error. Under the plain provision last noted, we do not need the guide of other courts to lead us to this conclusion; but in harmony with it are People v. Brotherton, 47 Cal. 838; People v. Leong Sing, 77 Cal. 117, and cases cited, and People v. Olsen, 80 Cal. 123.

The judgment in this cause should be and is affirmed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SUPREME COURT

Samuel FOWLER

Andrew SAKS et al., Appts.

1. A building regulation for the District of Columbia established under Act of Congress, which authorizes a party or division wall to be made good, repaired or taken down by one of the land owners if deemed necessary by the inspector of buildings, may properly require such owner to make good all damage to the adjoining owner.
2. One who has taken the benefit of a building regulation cannot repudiate the conditions on which it is given.
3. A party under an antecedent obligation to do a thing, or to do it in a particular way, cannot get rid of his responsibility by deputing it to somebody else.
4. The obligation to make good all damages to an adjoining owner by interference with a party-wall, whether it arises under building regulations or the common law, cannot be escaped by employing a contractor to do the work; and the fact that the damages were due to the negligence or unskillfulness of the contractor is no defense.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Special Term of the Supreme Court overruling their motion for a new trial on exceptions taken during the trial of an action to recover damages for injuries alleged to have resulted from the taking down of a party-wall, in which a verdict had been returned in plaintiff's favor. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sidney T. Thomas and Enoch Totten, for appellants:

If a nuisance necessarily occurs in the ordinary mode of doing the work let to an independent contractor, the occupant or owner is liable; but if it is from the negligence of the contractor or his servants, he alone should be responsible.

NOTE.—Party-wall defined.

A party-wall is a substitute for a separate wall to each adjoining owner, and neither owner may impair its value as to the other owner. See note to Everett v. Edward (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 110. See, as to definition of a party-wall, note to Nalle v. Paggi (Tex.) 1 L. R. A. 33.

A party-wall is joint property from the time it is built; but the builder has a right to the whole as security of the debt due by one party for half the cost. Gibson v. Holden, 1 West. Rep. 677, 115 Ill. 120.

All that the builder can convey, under the agreement of the other party to pay half the cost, is the title to his lot and the easement of the half of the wall resting on the adjoining lot, the title to the other lot being in the other owner. Ibid.

The claim for reimbursement for half the cost of the wall is personal, and does not run with the land. Ibid.; Huling v. Chester, 2 West. Rep. 175, 19 Mo. App. 607.

The right to payment of one half the expense of building a party-wall is personal, and goes to the personal representative of deceased. Ibid. See note to Nalle v. Paggi, supra.

Its use.

Either party may make any use of it which he may require, either by deepening the foundations or increasing the height, so far as it can be done without injury to the other. Field v. Leiter, 6 West. Rep. 54, 117 Ill. 341. See notes to Matthews v. Dixey (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 102; Everett v. Edwards (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 110.

There is no division of the ownership of a party-wall, but the whole belongs jointly to the neighboring proprietors, independently of the dividing line between the lots. Wall v. Baker, 39 La. Ann. 1102.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the whole of a party-wall, with its flues and appurtenances, as originally constructed, is presumed to have been so constructed by common consent, at the common expense, and for the common benefit of the proprietors. Ibid.

That a flue is constructed in the lower stories of a party-wall, in that half of it which is on the side of one property, does not establish exclusive ownership in the flue or destroy the presumption that it was intended for the common use and benefit of the parties. Ibid.

The incidental lateral support which may be given by a party-wall to a perfectly independent wall which only touches it at different and distinct places, and where the independent wall is sufficient in and of itself to stand all the demands which may be made upon it for years to come, is not within the terms of a contract for the use of a party-wall for a stipulated consideration. Kingsland v. Tucker, 115 N. Y. 574.

It is not necessary, to constitute a "use," within the meaning of that term as used in an agreement to pay for such use, that the wall of the new building should be tied or anchored to the party-wall, and be lined up to it at all points; but a lateral support received from the party-wall at various points, and placed where the two structures could come in contact, contributing to the strength, stability and safety of the new wall, will constitute such use. Kingsland v. Tucker, 44 Hun, 91.

Where, on the line of adjoining lots owned by the same party, there is erected a party-wall, a conveyance of one of the lots, unless there are express

One who contracts to do a specific piece of work, furnishing his own assistants and executing the work either entirely in accordance with his own ideas, or in accordance with a plan previously given to him by the person for whom the work is done, without being subject to the orders of the latter in respect of the details of the work, is clearly a contractor and not a servant.

For an injury to buildings the party making excavation on the adjoining land can only be held liable where there is a want of due care.

If the building regulation declared the defendants indebted to the plaintiff in such amount as the jury might find was necessary to repair his premises, then it is void; it is legislation, and Congress had no power to delegate to the executive authority of this district legislative functions.

Where a party-wall is built equally upon the lots of adjoining owners by one of them, and is afterwards used for a building erected by the other, who does not pay to the owner one half the value thereof, as required by Iowa Code, § 2020, but conveys the lot to one having full notice of the facts, the purchaser is liable to the grantee of the person who built the wall, in an action to recover half the cost thereof. Pew v. Buchanan, 72 Iowa, 637.

Easement and servitude created by agreement.

An agreement made between adjoining owners, in relation to a party-wall erected on the division line of their lots, is binding on the parties, and creates an equitable charge, easement and servitude upon the lots built upon. Keating v. Korfhage, 4 West. Rep. 599, 88 Mo. 544; Gibson v. Holden, 1 West. Rep. 677, 115 Ill. 199; Huling v. Chester, 2 West. Rep. 175, 19 Mo. App. 607.

The effect of such an agreement is to create cross-easements as to each other, which bind all persons succeeding to the estates to which the easements are appurtenant. Sharp v. Cheatnam, 5 West. Rep. 373, 88 Mo. 498.

The doctrine of contribution is founded, not on contract, but on the principle that equality of burden as to a common right is equity. Ibid.

An agreement between adjoining owners, for the erection of a party-wall, made a covenant running with the land, is a breach of subsequent conveyance by one of the owners with covenant against incumbrances; and the measure of damages is the depreciation in value of the land, considering that the agreement created mutual easements or servitudes. Mackey v. Harmon, 34 Minn. 168.

A court of equity will enforce an agreement in regard to a party-wall, as well against the purchaser with notice as against the original party. Sharp v. Cheatnam, supra.

An agreement by an adjoining owner to pay for a share of a party-wall when he should have occasion to use it does not run with the land, and does not bind a purchaser, even if he has notice of it. See note to Nalle v. Paggi (Tex.) 1 L. R. A. 33.

Where an adjoining owner acquiesces in the construction of a party-wall, such acquiescence estops him and those claiming under him from afterwards objecting to the method or materials whereby and wherewith such wall was constructed. Keating v. Korfhage, supra.

Law relating to party-walls.

The law relating to party-walls is no invasion of the absolute right of property; it prescribes simply a rule for the convenient, economical and safe enjoyment of property by the owner. Authorities cited in Barns v. Wilson, 8 Cent. Rep. 466, 116 Pa. 303.

One of two adjoining owners of land in a city, who erects a wall over the property line, under ordinances respecting party-walls, cannot claim the benefit of such wall as a party-wall, unless it be built of the width prescribed by the ordinance, and also be solid and free from any opening. Traute v. White (N. J.) 19 Atl. Rep. 183.

A party-wall, under building regulations which allow its construction by one party without the consent of the other, cannot be constructed, against his will, with windows or openings which overlook the servient tenement. Corcoran v. Nallor (D. C.) 6 Mackey, 580.

When one proprietor exercises the right as to a party-wall granted by La. Civ. Code, art. 683, his neighbor is bound to bear, without indemnity, the inconvenience and injury consequent thereon, so far as they are inseparable from the exercise of the right. Heine v. Merrick (La.) 5 So. Rep. 700.

The party making the addition to a party-wall does it at his peril, and if injury result he is liable for all damages. He must insure the safety of the operation.

Brooks v. Curtis, 50 N. Y. 644. See also Clark v. Fry, 8 Ohio St. 359.

Defendants were under a positive duty to make good to plaintiff any damages occasioned by their work, and they cannot shift their obligations to a contractor.

Cox, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been done, by the defendants, to a building belonging to the plaintiff, immediately north of and adjoining the new store erected by Saks & Company on the corner of Pennsylvania Avenue and Seventh Street.

It is known that the lot was occupied formerly by another building some five stories in height, well known in judicial history as having been erected by Miss Dermott, which passed afterwards into the ownership of Mr. Jesse Wilson. Mr. Fowler bought his lot in 1850, adjoining this building, and made use of the north wall of it as a party-wall, resting his rafters in that wall. In 1884, the defendants, Saks & Company, entered into possession under an agreement with Mr. Wilson for a twenty-year lease, which agreement was performed on Mr. Wilson's part by the execution of such a lease on the 16th of October, the same year. As soon as they entered into possession, they entered into a contract with Kenderdine and Paret to pull down the existing building and erect a new one, which is the present structure. In the course of that work it became necessary to remove the north wall which had been used as a party-wall. In doing so, the contractors did undertake to shore up and protect the building of Mr. Fowler, the plaintiff, but, as he alleges, did it very imperfectly, and the consequence was that his building was weakened, cracked and settled, and was permanently injured.

At the trial of the case, only one instruction was given by the court at the instance of the plaintiff. That related merely to the measure of damages. There were thirteen instructions asked by the defendants. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,784; there was a motion for a new trial before the trial justice, on exceptions, which was overruled, and an appeal was taken to this court.

One of the complaints in the argument, as to rulings of the court, may be resolved into three propositions:

First. That the declaration in this case relies entirely upon the alleged neglect of the defendants in failing to properly protect the building of the plaintiff in the course of their operation of building; and

Second. That the court allowed the plaintiff to spring upon the defendants, in the trial, one of the building regulations of the District, which was not made the foundation of the claim in the declaration at all. It reads as follows:

"The inspector of buildings shall, upon the application of any building owner or his authorized agent, examine any or all existing party or division wall; if deemed by said inspector to be defective, out of repair or otherwise unfit for the purpose of new buildings about to be erected, such party or division wall shall be made good, repaired or taken down by the building owner, as the decision may be, the cost and expense of which repair or removal, together with the expense of the new wall or walls to be erected in lieu thereof, shall be borne and paid exclusively by him; and he shall also make good all damage occasioned thereby to the adjoining owner or his premises."

And it is further claimed that the trial judge rested his rulings upon that building regulation, whereas, it is said, that was not the foundation of the claim in the declaration.

And the third proposition is, that so much of this regulation as imposes upon the building owner the duty of making good all damage caused by taking down a party-wall is not strictly a building regulation but is entirely ultra vires and void.

On examining the declaration, we find that it is not confined to the allegation of negligence on the part of the defendants as to the manner in which they prosecuted their work, but it alleges that "it was the duty of the said defendants to use such care, skill and workmanship in the destruction of said building on said lot . . . as to protect the plaintiff from all loss or injury to his said premises by reason of the destruction of said building and party-wall by said defendants." "And further, that it was the duty of said defendants to care for plaintiff's said building during the time occupied in the prosecution of said work, and to properly and skillfully rebuild and shore said party-wall, and to make good all injuries occasioned to plaintiff's said building and to repair all damage occasioned to plaintiff's said building by the said works of defendants or by the failure of defendants to do all acts necessary by them to be done. Yet," and here is the breach alleged, "the said defendants, by their said agents and servants, so negligently, unskillfully, wrongfully and improperly tore down said building and said party-wall so adjoining and forming part of plaintiff's said building as aforesaid without properly shoring up, propping up or duly securing plaintiff's said building from damage by reason of their tearing down and destroying the said building and party-wall as aforesaid, so that for want of such proper shoring up, propping up or duly securing thereof the said house of the plaintiff became and was by and through the tearing down and destroying of the said building and party-wall adjoining the plaintiff's said premises, greatly weakened, damaged and injured, and as a consequence thereof, in part fell down, by reason of which negligent, unskillful, improper and wrongful tearing down of said building and party-wall, and of the defendants' failure properly and skillfully to guard and protect the plaintiff's said building, and by reason of said defendants' failure to care for plaintiff's said building during the time occupied in the prosecution of said work by said defendants, and of their failure to make good all injuries occasioned to said building and to repair all damages occasioned to said building by the said works of said defendants, and to properly and skillfully rebuild and restore said party-wall; and by reason of the failure of defendants to do all acts necessary by them to be done the plaintiff was and is greatly damaged," etc.

So that we think the declaration is not founded upon merely alleged neglect of the defendants, but upon their duty to make good all damages occasioned by the prosecution of their operations in the particulars mentioned.

When we come to see the instructions of the court, we find that, at the instance of the plaintiff, only one instruction was given, which is as follows:

"If the jury shall find for the plaintiff, the measure of damages is such amount as the jury may find from the evidence was expended by plaintiff for the necessary preservation of his premises during the work of taking down and putting up the party-wall, together with such sum as the jury may find would be necessary to restore the plaintiff's premises to the same condition they were in before the taking down of said party-wall, and in addition thereto such amount as the plaintiff would necessarily lose in rent during said restoration, if they shall find that plaintiff would be subjected to such loss of rent."

The court refused the 18th instruction asked by the defendants but granted it with a modification. That instruction was:

"If the jury shall be satisfied from the evidence that the old wall between the plaintiff's building and the premises occupied by the defendants was skillfully and carefully taken down, and that the new party-wall was constructed with reasonable care and skill, and that the property of the plaintiff was reasonably cared for and protected during the building thereof and then restored with reasonable care and skill and with proper material, the defendants are entitled to your verdict. The defendants possessed the lawful right to take down the old building and to build a new one in its place, provided such work was done with reasonable care and skill and with proper material."

The court refused to grant that except with the qualification: "Provided that the building of the plaintiff, so far as affected by the taking down and erection of said party-wall, was restored to the like good condition in which it was at the time of taking down said party-wall."

The court gave no instruction as to what hypothetical state of facts would justify a verdict for the plaintiff, but it may be inferred from these two instructions, that is, the instruction as to the measure of damages and the qualification I have just mentioned, that the court did deem it the duty of the defendants to make good the damages occasioned by the destruction of that party-wall. The court does not in terms derive this duty either from the building regulation or from the common law, but if the duty is prescribed by either,—validly prescribed by the building regulation or one that is enjoined by the common law,—that would be sufficient to vindicate the rulings of the court. That brings us to the subject of party-walls in general, and the rights and obligations connected with them.

What we understand now by a party-wall had no existence at common law, except by convention between coterminous proprietors. A man had no right to enter upon and occupy a part of his neighbor's land for his own convenience or for any purpose whatever without his consent. The privilege or easement, as we call it, giving to a builder the right of erecting a division-wall between himself and his neighbor, partly upon his neighbor's land, is therefore purely the creature of legislation.

Under authority of the deeds executed by the original proprietors of land within the District to the trustees Beall and Gantt, which are very well known in this District, and of the Act of Maryland of 1791, making the cession of the District to the United States, General Washington promulgated certain building regulations. One of these is in the following terms:

"October 17, 1791.

"That the person or persons appointed by commissioners to superintend the buildings may enter on the land of any person to set out the foundation and regulate the walls to be built between party and party as to the breadth and thickness thereof, which foundation shall be laid equally upon the lands of the persons between whom such party-walls are to be built, and shall be of the breadth and thickness determined by such person proper; and the first builder shall be reimbursed one moiety of the charge of such party-wall or so much thereof as the next builder shall have occasion to make use of, before such next builder shall any use or break into the wall,—the charge or value thereof to be set by the person or persons so appointed by the commissioners."

This building regulation, so authorized, is the foundation and the only source of the right claimed by anyone here to locate his party-wall one half on his neighbor's land. If the regulation stopped there, and we conceive a case in which the party-wall is thus established, the question would naturally arise, Has either party a right afterwards to disturb that party-wall, pull it down, built up a larger one or make an addition to the existing wall, underpin it or raise it higher for his own purposes? On general principles, it would seem not, for the simple reason that each party then has a vested right in that wall, whether you call them tenants in common or tenants in severalty as to the parts occupying their respective lots of ground. If tenants in common, each has the right to have his interest in common undisturbed; if they are tenants in severalty each has the right to one half of the wall in severalty, and to the support of the other half. On general principles, it would seem neither one has the right to disturb the wall. This seems to be the current of the authorities, with this simple qualification, that if the wall becomes dilapidated, so that it actually needs to be reconstructed, then either party may, for his own protection, remove the wall; but with that exception, the rule, I think, seems to be, that at common law, independently of any legislation, neither party would have a right to pull down the wall once established. The cases on this subject will be found collated in 2 Washburn on Easements, pages 604 to 621.

There are cases, however, which hold that either party may underpin a wall or raise it higher for his own purposes, as long as he can do it without prejudice to the adjoining building. The cases on that subject will be found referred to in Cooley on Torts, on pages 878 and 874, and also collated in the case of Brooks v. Curtis, in 50 N. Y. 689.

But in those cases it does not become a mere question of care or diligence. There is an absolute duty imposed upon the proprietor who makes an alteration in the wall for the purposes mentioned, to see that his neighbor's property is not injured, and whether he exercises care and skill or not, he is absolutely responsible for any injury that results from the change.

We may assume, then, that, in the absence of legislative sanction, one of two conterminous owners has no right to pull down a party-wall; if he does so, he commits a trespass and he is liable in damages, and the natural measure of damages would be what it would cost to restore the property of his neighbor to the condition in which it was before he entered upon that undertaking. That is his common-law liability, and, we may say, his duty.

In that condition of the law, a new building regulation is enacted. By Act of Congress of June 14, 1878, the commissioners were authorized to establish such new building regulations as they may deem proper. Thereupon a new building regulation was added to the existing ones in the following terms, which has been already read but I will read it again.

"The inspector of buildings shall, upon the application of any building owner or his authorized agent, examine any or all existing party or division-wall, and if deemed by said inspector to be defective, out of repair or otherwise unfit for the purpose of new buildings about to be erected such party or division-wall shall be made good"—that is the important part in the present case—"repaired, or taken down by the building owner, as the decision may be, the cost and expense of which repair or removal, together with the expense of the new wall or walls to be erected in lieu thereof"—that is, whether defective, out of repair or otherwise unfit for the purpose of erecting a new building thereon—"shall be borne and paid exclusively by him, and he shall also make good all damage occasioned thereby to the adjoining owner or his premises."

Now, it is said that this latter part is not a building regulation, but is an ordinance by these commissioners that the building owner should make good all damages occasioned by his act. If there had been a pre-existing right to take down the wall and then the commissioners had afterwards attempted to establish an independent regulation to the effect that the party exercising that right should have to pay damages for it, perhaps it might be contended with at least plausibility, if not success, that such a regulation would not strictly be a building regulation, but would belong to the legislative authority; but, in the present form I think the building regulation must be read as prescribing the condition upon which this privilege or easement of taking down and reconstructing a party-wall is conferred. It should be remembered that there is no right at all to remove a party-wall, except such as is derived from this building regulation. Now, it does seem that the commissioners, in ordaining (if I may use that expression) such a building regulation, giving that privilege which is an unusual one—a departure from the common law—had a right to prescribe such conditions as were just and reasonable. We cannot doubt that this would be a just and reasonable condition. It is to be read, therefore, as giving the right to take down and remove and reconstruct this party-wall on the condition that the expense of it shall be paid exclusively by the building owner, and that "he shall also make good all damage occasioned thereby to the adjoining owner or his premises."

The defendants invoke that regulation as a warrant for their proceeding. They cannot take the benefit of that building regulation and repudiate the conditions on which it is given. The Supreme Court in a recent case just decided, Keller v. Ashford, 183 U. S. 610 [83 L. ed. 667], used language appropriate to that question. That case, it will be remembered, was one in which one Thompson conveyed certain real estate to Dr. Ashford, subject to certain incumbrances which the grantee assumed. After the property was sold, falling short of realizing the amount of the incumbrances, a bill was filed to compel him to pay the balance. The court said he could not take the benefit of the deeds to him without also assuming the burdens.

So, anyone who invokes the authority of this building regulation to justify him entering his neighbor's premises and pulling down his wall, must take it subject to the condition annexed to that permission, which, in itself, is a perfectly reasonable condition. As a matter of fact, also, the defendants in this case did accept the privilege with the condition, and did assume the duty which the building regulation purports to impose upon them. It appears from the testimony of Mr. Entwistle that when he gave the permit to pull down the north wall it was given with the notice that they would be required to make good all damages occasioned thereby to the adjoining owner. And thereupon the defendants, in making their contract with Kenderdine and Paret, put in this provision:

"As the walls of the present building are to be taken down, the contractor is to shore up all joists, etc., in the adjoining buildings, board up and make weather tight the several stories of the buildings and space under roofs, and as soon as practicable after the new walls are up, plaster and restore all the work injured by taking down the walls and put it in as good condition as it was before the walls were removed."

To save themselves harmless, they make the contractor enter into that engagement; and the contractor did enter upon the lot of the plaintiff and undertake to shore up his building and restore it to its former condition, but the complaint is that he did not shore it up sufficiently and, in consequence, it got out of plumb and was generally injured. So that the reasonable condition prescribed by this building regulation was recognized, assumed and accepted by the defendants themselves when they undertook to tear down the wall and when they made this contract with Kenderdine and Paret. It is not for them to say now that the condition was void when it is annexed to a privilege which they undertook to exercise.

The building regulation may reasonably receive still another reading. At common law, a party had no right to enter upon and take down this wall, and if he did so, he was liable to make good the damage. If this regulation had said nothing about damages, the question might have been made whether it intended to confer the privilege of taking down the wall without regard to the consequences to the neighbor; but, as it is expressed, it simply gives a privilege which did not exist at common law, but reserves the common-law liability for the consequences. We are satisfied, therefore, that upon all the grounds—both on the ground that this building regulation prescribed a reasonable condition, and also because the building regulation may be entirely ignored and the defendants would still be under an obligation to make good the damages occasioned by this entry upon their neighbor's land, whether the justice at the trial based his opinion upon the common-law duty or the duty prescribed by the building regulation—he was right.

The next important question in the case is that relating to the subject of independent contractors. It is claimed that this work was not done by the defendants, Saks & Company, but done by Kenderdine and Paret, who were not their agents in the matter, but independent contractors. The distinction is very well understood between an agent and an independent contractor. I employ a man to do work for me—to build my house, for example,—under my express directions as to all the details. He becomes my agent and I become responsible for all injuries resulting to other people from his neglect; but if I am compelled to have work done which requires technical skill, and employ a man versed in that species of work, and trust the matter entirely to him, and contract with him simply for the result, and have no control whatever over the means and details of producing it, that man becomes an independent contractor, and I am not, as a general rule, responsible for injuries to other people through his negligence. That would be illustrated in this case by supposing somebody passing along the street where this building was in course of construction to be injured by falling bricks or timber through the negligence of the contractor. The owners of the building would not have been responsible in that case. There is no doubt at all that this was a case of independent contractor. These defendants had no skill in building. They never undertook to exercise any, but trusted it entirely to their contractors, Kenderdine and Paret.

But the rule itself has certain very proper and reasonable exceptions. These are expressed, perhaps, as well as anywhere else, in Cooley on Torts, pages 547 and 548.

"In general," it is said, "it is entirely competent for one having any particular work to be performed to enter into agreement with an independent contractor to take charge of and do the whole work, employing his own assistants and being responsible only for the completion of the work as agreed. The exceptions to this statement are the following: He must not contract for that the necessary or probable effect of which would be to injure others, and he cannot, by any contract, relieve himself of duties resting upon him as owner of real estate not to do or suffer to be done upon it that which will constitute a nuisance, and therefore an invasion of the rights of others. Observing these rules, he may make contracts, under which the contractor, for the time being, becomes an independent principal, whose servants are exclusively his, and not those of the employer he contracts with; and the contractor is in no such sense the servant of his employer as to give to others rights against the employer growing out of the contractor's negligence. In one case the following rules have been laid down: "1. If a contractor faithfully performs his contract, and a third person is injured by the contractor in the course of its due performance or by its result, the employer is liable, for he causes the precise act to be done which occasions the injury, but for the negligence of the contractor not done under the contract, but in violation of it, the employer is in general not liable. 2. If I employ a contractor to do a job of work for me which, in the progress of its execution, obviously exposes others to unusual perils, I ought, I think, to be responsible on the same principle as in the last case, for I cause acts to be done which naturally expose others to injury."

This question generally arises where a man is doing or causing work to be done on his own premises, but the present is a case where he has actually entered upon the premises of another man. It is hardly necessary to say that that kind of work is, necessarily and per se, a nuisance. In the first place, it causes inevitable temporary disarrangement and inconvenience; it imperils the safety of the adjoining building and very often results, as in the present case, in its permanent injury; and in a case of that kind it would seem to be extremely unjust that the building owner should get rid of his responsibility by contracting with somebody else to prosecute this work, especially as his contractor, although a reputable and skillful builder, may be peculiarly irresponsible.

Then, another exception to the rule would be where a party is under an antecedent obligation to do a thing, or to do a thing in a particular way. In that case he cannot get rid of his responsibility by deputing it to somebody else. That principle is illustrated in the case of Baltimore v. O'Donnell, 58 Md. 110. There a contractor had been employed to do certain work on one of the public streets. An excavation had been made but it was imperfectly protected and a person fell into it and was injured. The court of appeals says:

"The appellant contends that inasmuch as the work was being done by an independent contractor pursuing an employment wholly independent of the city, who was free to exercise his own judgment as to the mode of conducting the work and the assistants he was to employ, the rule of respondent superior does not apply, and that the contractor alone is responsible, if anyone is. In reply, the appellee admits that, ordinarily, as a condition precedent to holding a superior amenable, the relation of master and servant must be shown to exist, and that in the case of a contractor employing others to do the work these sub-employees cannot be strictly regarded as servants of the city; but he insists that another rule applies which fixes the responsibility of the city in this case. That rule he insists is this: That where the person for whom the work to be done is under a pre-existing obligation to have the work done in a particular way or to have certain precautions against accident observed, he cannot be discharged by creating the relation between himself and another of employer and contractor. The learned judge who decided the case below regarded the appellant as under such pre-existing obligation, and so instructed the jury, and it is that ruling we are asked to review;" and the court affirmed the ruling.

It seems to me that case lays down a very clear principle. In this case it was the duty of the defendants, either under the building regulations or the common law, to make good all damages occasioned by this building operation, and they could not get rid of that duty by employing a contractor to do the work.

This kind of case is distinguishable from those in which a man occasions an injury to a neighbor by work on his own premises, as by excavation. It seems to be pretty well settled that a man has a right to support his own land by the adjoining land, and if his neighbor digs down his land so as to deprive him of that support so that his land caves in, he has a right of action, although his neighbor may exercise all the care and skill he can. He is absolutely bound to make good the damages. But a man, unless in certain instances, as where he has a clear right by prescription or otherwise, has no right to the support for buildings that he loads his land with in that way. The law then requires that a man who excavates his own land at the risk of his neighbor's buildings must exercise proper care and skill; but on the other hand the authorities also hold that even in that case this duty of exercising care and skill cannot be deputed to a contractor so as to relieve the owner of responsibility.

Certain cases were cited in the argument to this effect, as the case of Bouer v. Peate, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 821, where it was held that where one ordered work even on his own premises which would naturally threaten injurious consequences to his neighbor, that is, pulling down a house and the excavation of land, he was bound to see to the doing of all that was necessary to prevent it and could not relieve himself from that responsibility by employing a contractor.

In Tarry v. Ashton, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 314, it was held that one keeping a lamp suspended in front of his house on a public highway was bound to keep it in a safe condition, and was not protected from the consequences of neglect by employing an independent contractor to attend to it.

In Hughes v. Percival, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 443, where the defendant took down his own house, in doing which his contractor cut into the party-wall between him and his neighbor—not even attempting to remove the party-wall,—and thereby caused the builder's house to fall and drag down the plaintiff's house, it was held that the law cast the duty on the defendant to see that skill and care were exercised in the operation, and he could not avoid the consequences by delegating the performance to a third person. If that rule operates where a man is building on his own land, with how much more force ought it to obtain where he is actually invading his neighbor's land and temporarily destroying part of his property?

We therefore are satisfied that the general rule exonerating a party who employs an independent contractor has no application at all to this case.

On looking at the instructions asked on the part of the defendants, it will be found that all of them, except the general instruction prayed for at the close of the evidence, "that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover," presented this same question in different forms. I will read a single one of the instructions to show the character of all. The third instruction:

"If the jury find from the evidence that the construction of the building mentioned in the declaration was done under the contract and specifications annexed thereto, given in evidence, and that the defendants neither furnished any of the material, machinery and labor employed in doing the work, nor exercised any control over it, either as to the mode or manner of doing it, and that the damage complained of was the result of negligence on the part of the contractors, Kenderline and Paret, and their employes, between whom and the defendants the court instructs the jury, the relation of master and servant did not exist, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action, and your verdict should be for the defendants."

That is a sample of the instructions. They are all simply variations of that one form. There are one or two minor questions presented by instructions which were not pressed at the argument and which do not seem to call for any remark. On the whole, we think the ruling of the court at the Trial Term ought to be affirmed.

James, J., said:

While concurring entirely in the conclusion reached, I prefer to base the liability of the defendants distinctly upon the ground of the common law. I do not think I am ready to say that the makers of the building regulations can add to or vary the liability the party incurs at common law in doing an act. I think, also, that the defendants' liability may be based upon the ground that they assumed the liability by contract, for when they were informed of the terms of the building regulations, they substantially said, "Very well, we accept them, and will remove these walls on those terms, and will make good the damages, if there are any." I think the conclusion of the court may be rested on either of these two grounds, but am not prepared to say that in making a building regulation the commissioners can impose in invitum the liability a man incurs, and say what he shall pay for injuring the property of another. It is only for the purpose of avoiding any contribution to that idea that I have said this much.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

George B. JOHNSON, Appt.,

v.

Henry W. LEMAN et al.

(.....III.....)

1. A trust estate is not chargeable with the compensation of a broker for securing a loan for the benefit of the trust under a contract of employment by the trustee, who agreed that payment for the service should be made from the trust fund, if he did not make it a specific lien thereon, or stipulate that he should not be personally liable, and the trustee or his estate is solvent.
2. The death of a trustee who has employed a broker to perform services for the trust estate, and the consummation of the contract of his successor, will not render the estate liable if it was not liable when the contract was made.

(January 21, 1890.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County dismissing the bill in a suit to obtain from a trust estate compensation for services rendered in procuring a loan for its benefit. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Tenney, Bashford & Tenney, with Messrs. Peckham & Brown, for appellant:

Even were the trustee alive, and trustee of the estate, and were he pecuniarily responsible, yet this court would compel him, should he refuse without such compulsion to do so, to pay from the funds of the estate, if he had them in his hands, this claim which Mr. Johnson is now suing.

As this is a matter appertaining to a trust, and as it appears that there is a fund connected with that trust justly due to the appellant, and no legal remedy whatever by which he can secure it, a court of equity should put out its hands and take possession of that fund for the benefit of the person to whom it is due.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 180; Kirkpatrick v. McDonald, 11 Pa. 387.

The appellant is entitled to the intervention of a court of equity in his behalf, because he is seeking only that the court, in a case where he has no other remedy, shall instruct and control a trustee in the discharge of the duties which, under the supervision of a court of equity, he has to perform.

Bispham, Eq. pt. 1, chap. 6, p. 181.

Messrs. William C. Wilson and David L. Zook, for appellees:

No one can bring a trust fund into chancery, who has no interest in or lien on the trust fund. A mere agent of the trustee has no interest in nor lien on such fund and cannot bring such action.

Scholfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant's case, stated briefly, and in the most favorable view for him warranted by the record, is this: He was employed as a broker, by the trustee of the Sherman House property, in Chicago, to obtain a loan for the benefit of that trust. The best interests of the trust required that the loan should be obtained, and the trustee promised him that he should be paid for obtaining the loan a stipulated commission from the trust fund. He did all the work necessary to obtain the loan; but, before the party from whom the loan was to be obtained signified its formal acceptance of the terms proposed by him, the trustee by whom he was employed died. A subsequent trustee obtained the loan on substantially the same terms as those for which he had negotiated, and thus the trust had the fruits of his labor. It is not alleged that the agreement between the trustee and the appellant was that the trustee should not be personally liable to appellant upon their contract, or that the compensation for obtaining the loan should be a specific lien on the trust fund, or that the same was thereby assigned by the trustee to the appellant; nor is it alleged that the trustee was, or that his estate is now, insolvent. The question is, Does the claim of appellant for compensation for his services in obtaining the loan constitute a charge against the trust estate which a court of equity will decree payment of out of that estate (the funds being ample) on bill filed by appellant? The general rule is that the expenses of properly administering a trust are a lien on behalf of the trustee on the estate in his hands; and he will not be compelled to part with his control of that estate until such expenses are paid. But this, unless it may be in exceptional cases, does not extend to persons employed by the trustee. In general, their only remedy for compensation is personal against the trustee employing them. Hill, Trustees, 4th Am. ed. 879 [567]; Lewin, Tr. 7th ed. 549; Perry, Tr. § 907; Tiff. & B. Tr. 583; Worsall v. Harford, 8 Ves. Jr. 7, 8; Heriot's Hospital v. Ross, 12 Clark & F. 507; Hall v. Laver, 1 Hare, 571; Francis v. Francis, 5 De G. M. & G. 108; Re Sada, 8 Beav. 650; Jones v. Dawson, 19 Ala. 673; Fearn v. Mayers, 58 Miss. 458.

NOTE.—Trustee cannot create a lien on trust estate. A trustee cannot create a lien in favor of a creditor without express authority given by the trust deed. Steele v. Steele, 64 Ala. 438. The general rule is, that a trustee cannot charge the trust estate by his executory contracts unless so authorized by the terms of the instrument creating the trust. New v. Nicoll, 73 N. Y. 127; Durch v. Breckenridge, 16 B. Mon. 438; Meyer v. Cole, 12 7 L. R. A.

The exception to this rule is where he is authorized to make the expenditure and he has no trust funds on hand, and the expenditure is necessary. In such case he may himself advance the money, and would have a lien upon the trust estate, and could by express contract transfer his lien to another, who, upon the faith of the estate, may make the expenditure. New v. Nicoll, 73 N. Y. 127; Randall v. Dusenbury, 7 Jones & S. 174, 66 N. Y. 645; Stanton v. King, 8 Hun, 4.

It is manifestly irrelevant to notice cases where, the beneficiary of a fund in the hands of a trustee becoming indebted, it has been held the creditor may have satisfaction from the fund, as in Frazier v. Brownlow, 8 Ired. Eq. 237, cited by counsel for the appellant, since this is not the contract of the beneficiary of the fund, but of the trustee; nor cases that might be cited where it has been held that solicitors, etc., had a lien upon the amount realized to the estate in the case in which they had been employed for their costs, because appellant is not a solicitor or attorney seeking the recovery of taxable costs, nor is he seeking the enforcement of a lien upon a specific fund brought to the estate through his endeavors. The borrowed money was paid out in satisfaction of previous loans, and appellant seeks recourse against any unappropriated trust funds of the estate.

Counsel for appellant cite and rely upon Noyes v. Blakeman, 6 N. Y. 567, and New v. Nicoll, 78 N. Y. 127, as laying down a rule by which his claim may be sustained. Those cases certainly go in the direction of his contention much further than any other cases of which we have knowledge, but, if we were to concede that they are the law here, it is impossible that he could recover.

In Noyes v. Blakeman, the recovery was only sustained by a divided court, and there upon the ground that the agreement was that the trustee was not to incur any personal liability, and that the claim was to be paid out of the income of the trust estate.

In New v. Nichol, it is conceded in the opinion (page 180) that "the general rule undoubtedly is that a trustee cannot charge the trust estate by his executory contracts, unless authorized to do so by the terms of the instrument creating the trust. Upon such contracts he is personally liable, and the remedy is against him personally." The court, however, adds: "But there are exceptions to this general rule. When a trustee is authorized to make an expenditure, and he has no trust funds, and the expenditure is necessary for the protection, reparation or safety of the trust estate, and he is not willing to make himself personally liable, he may, by express agreement, make the expenditure a charge upon the trust estate. In such a case he could himself advance the money to make the expenditure, and he would have a lien upon the trust estate; and he can by express contract transfer this lien to any other party who may, upon the faith of the trust estate, make the expenditure." And the court further adds: "It was not sufficient for him to show that he did the work upon the faith or credit of the trust estate. He could get a lien or charge upon the trust estate only by virtue of some agreement to that effect."

It has been seen, there was here no agreement releasing the trustee from liability, and assigning his lien to appellant, or otherwise creating a lien in behalf of appellant upon the trust estate. We express no opinion whether, if the facts presented to us the precise case before the New York court, we should follow their ruling. It is sufficient that no such case now demands the expression of our opinion.

Counsel for appellant have also cited in support of their contention our decision in Greene v. Grimshaw, 11 Ill. 389. The question there originated in the probate court, and was whether a claim presented by attorneys at-law against an estate for professional services in an action at law, whereby assets of the estate were collected, should be allowed as a charge against the estate, and it was held that it should. The Statute then in force provided that expenses of the settlement of the estate should be allowed against the estate in the second class. See section 115, chap. 109, Rev. Stat. 1845.

It is true that the Statute was not cited in the opinion, but the only controversy was whether the judgment in the recovery of which the attorney's services were rendered was for the executrix personally, or for the estate, the controversy assuming that, if for the latter, the estate was liable, and so there was no necessity for referring to the Statute. The decision therefore has no bearing upon the question involved here.

It is earnestly insisted by counsel for appellant that the death of the trustee before the consummation of the negotiations to borrow money, the subsequent transfer of the trust property to another person acting as trustee, and the subsequent decision of the courts that the person with whom appellant contracted and the person to whom the trust property was subsequently transferred were not lawfully appointed trustees, are exceptional reasons to take the present case from without the operation of the general rule, as stated supra. But it is manifest that that rule cannot logically be affected by these circumstances. If the trustee was liable individually, no rule of law is better settled than that his death did not terminate it, nor could any possible reason exist why, if the estate was not liable when the contract was made, it should become liable by the fact of the subsequent death of the trustee. If the trust property was liable when the contract was made, it would be equally liable when transferred to a subsequent trustee. If it was not then liable, it is not possible to reasonably conceive of its being made liable by the mere act of subsequent transfer. If the validity of the appointment of the trustees cannot be inquired into in this case, then, beyond all question, it is immaterial how the courts have decided, or, indeed, whether they have decided at all, upon that question. If the validity of the appointment of the trustees can be inquired into in this case, it is not to be conceived that appellant's position can be strengthened thereby, since, if the act of a trustee would not, under the circumstances, have rendered the estate liable, much less could the act of a mere intermeddler, having no authority of law, have done so.

It is argued by counsel that the rule, however well adapted to the conditions of things in the days of Lord Eldon, is not adapted to the conditions of things to-day. It may be that trust estates are more numerous, and the property values affected thereby are much greater, now than then, but we do not perceive that these affect the reason of the rule.

Lord Eldon said in Worrall v. Harford, supra, that it would be quite mischievous to allow every person with whom the trustees may contract to have an account of the whole administration of the estate; and without such an account such claimant could in no case have a decree against the trust funds. It would seem obvious that the greater the estate the more mischievous this would be. The rule can work no great hardships. If a trustee shall be unable to procure the services of the necessary agent upon his own responsibility, let him apply to the chancellor for permission to charge the estate specially for that purpose. In our opinion, the ends of justice will be best subserved by adhering to the rule.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Mary A. WINTERS

v.

Jeremiah DeTURK, Appt.

1. The Statute of Limitations cannot run against any person until his or her right has accrued.

2. There is no adverse holding by the grantee of land during the life of the grantor against the dower right of the grantor's wife who did not join in the conveyance; but it is otherwise in the case of a disseisor who has acquired title by adverse possession as against the husband during his lifetime.

NOTE.—Statute of Limitations does not begin to run until right of action accrues.

Wright v. Tichenor, 2 West. Rep. 208, 104 Ind. 185; Ewell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 57; Sims v. Gay, 6 West. Rep. 559, 109 Ind. 501.

It is of the essence of the Statute of Limitations not to run against a party until a right of action has accrued to such party. Dyer v. Wittler, 4 West. Rep. 577, 80 Mo. 81.

It begins to run at the date suit may be commenced, and, once begun, it is not stayed by the death of the party in whose favor the right of action accrued. Kulp's App. 6 Cent. Rep. 886, 115 Pa. 356.

It runs immediately upon accrual of a cause of action, unless the party at the time is under some disability named in the Statute. Wright v. Kleyla, 2 West. Rep. 217, 104 Ind. 223.

It runs against all persons, whether under disabilities or not, unless they are excepted from its operation. Ibid.

The only effect of disability as to minors is to give them, if the full limitation has run during minority, two years thereafter within which to sue. Walker v. Hill, 9 West. Rep. 683, 111 Ind. 223; Sims v. Gay, 6 West. Rep. 559, 109 Ill. 501.

When two or more disabilities co-exist, or when one disability shall supervene an existing one, the period prescribed within which an action may be brought shall not begin to run until the expiration of the latest disability. Campbell v. Grater, 95 N. C. 156.

The Statute of Limitations begins to run when the right of action accrues; and unless otherwise provided for in the Statute, the right of action is not deemed to have accrued until there is a person authorized to prosecute the same. Ewell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 57; Glass v. Williams, 16 Lea, 697.

Under a state Statute of Limitations the time of the limitation commences when the cause of action is first subjected to the operation of the Statute, unless the Legislature has otherwise provided; and as to causes of action existing at the passage of the Act, the time will begin to run from the date when the Act takes effect. Sohn v. Waterson, 34 U. S. 17 Wall. 596 (21 L. ed. 737).

In case of real estate the right does not accrue until there is a right of entry. Wright v. Tichenor, 104 Ind. 185, 2 West. Rep. 208.

The Statute of Limitations begins to run from the time a tenant in common denies the right of his co-tenant. Almy v. Daniels, 4 New Eng. Rep. 915, 15 R. I. 815.

Until the death of the life tenant it does not run against the heirs. Orthwein v. Thomas, 11 West. Rep. 399, 127 Ill. 554.

It does not begin to run against the remainderman until determination of the prior estate. Fleming v. Burnham, 100 N. Y. 1, 1 Cent. Rep. 237.

The Pennsylvania Statute begins to run against a person having an estate tail, and also against the remaindermen, from the date of a conveyance by him. Bassett v. Hawk, 10 Cent. Rep. 788, 118 Pa. 94.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Berks County in favor of plaintiff in an action by a widow for dower out of property of which her husband had been seised but which he had aliened during the marriage by a deed in which she did not join. Affirmed.

At the trial in the court below defendant requested the court to charge, inter alia, as follows:

1. The Statute of Limitations of 1785 applies to this action of dower, unde nihil habet, by the widow for property of which her husband had been seised, but which he had aliened before his death.

Answer. "As a principle of law, the Statute begins to run from the death of the husband; and if this point is intended to apply to this case, that is, so as to debar the plaintiff of her right to recover, it is answered in the negative."

2. More than twenty-one years have elapsed, while the property was held adversely to the husband, before suit was brought; and hence the widow cannot recover in this action.

"This is answered in the negative."

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant took this appeal assigning as error, among other things, the answers to above points.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Under Cal. Code Civ. Proc., the Statute does not commence to run against devisees and legatees, in favor of heirs and distributees, until final distribution. Re Grider's Estate, 81 Cal. 571.

The special Statute of Limitations concerning claims against decedents' estates begins to run from the time that the substantial right of recovery accrues. Garesche v. Lewis, 11 West. Rep. 807, 96 Mo. 197.

On sale of real property.

It begins to run against an oral contract by a purchaser to pay a mortgage, from the time the debt is due and payable. Patterson v. Colmer (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 286.

The Statute of Limitations is a complete bar to an action of dower unde nihil habet.

Care v. Keller, 77 Pa. 487-493.

Messrs. John H. Rothermel and A. H. Rothermel for appellee.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At common law a wife was entitled to dower out of any lands of which her husband was seised at any time during coverture. Under our law the wife may convey her right to dower by joining with her husband in the deed. But if the husband conveys his land without his wife so joining, and executing the deed as prescribed by the Act of Assembly, her dower rights do not pass, and she can claim them after the death of her husband. In this case the husband conveyed the real estate in controversy in 1847. His wife did not join in said conveyance, nor did she in any manner release her dower rights. The title to the property finally became vested in Jeremiah De Turk, the appellant and defendant below. Isaac Winters, the husband and grantor, died in 1886, and shortly thereafter this claim for dower was made by his widow out of the land in the possession of the appellant. It was resisted on the ground that it was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The learned judge below thought otherwise, and there being no facts in dispute, directed a verdict in favor of plaintiff.

It is difficult to see how the Statute can run against any person until his or her right has accrued. No right accrued to the widow in this case until the death of her husband, and it would seem to follow logically that the Statute could not commence to run until then. It was so held in Culler v. Motzer, 13 Serg. & R. 356, where it was said by Justice

Upon covenants of warranty against incumbrances, it does not run until covenantee has made payment to protect his interests. Priest v. Deaver, 4 West. Rep. 308, 21 Mo. App. 209; Taylor v. Priest, 4 West. Rep. 329, 21 Mo. App. 686.

It does not begin to run against a grantee whose unrecorded deed was lost, until the subsequent purchaser takes possession. Mason v. Black, 3 West. Rep. 208, 87 Mo. 329.

Nor against a purchaser at execution sale before he becomes entitled to a deed; and whether then or when the deed is actually delivered, is not decided. Barrollhet v. Anspacher, 68 Cal. 114.

In an action to recover realty sold at a void sale, it begins to run from the time purchaser took possession, not from confirmation of the sale. L'Hommiedieu v. Cincinnati, W. & M. E. Co. 120 Ind. 436.

Sale of personal property.

It commences to run at the time of the sale, by one in possession, but without right to sell. Merrill v. Bullard, 4 New Eng. Rep. 111, 59 Vt. 389.

In a contract to account annually for sales of patented articles, the Statute begins to run from the time for accounting, and not from the time of sales made. Adams' App. 5 Cent. Rep. 136, 115 Pa. 449.

By principal against agent.

An action by a principal to recover money negligently invested by his agent accrues from the time he had knowledge of the facts upon which a right to make demand depended. King v. MacKellar, 11 Cent. Rep. 898, 109 N. Y. 215.

Duncan: "I cannot assent to the doctrine of the court of common pleas, that where the husband conveys without the wife's joining, the Statute of Limitations runs during the coverture. If the entry and possession had been adverse to the husband's right, and his right of entry had been barred by the Statute of Limitations, the widow's dower would have been barred. Our Act of Limitations comprehends as well all possessory actions; but here the entry was not adverse to the right of the husband. All was a continuation of the same inheritance, and therefore the Statute would not begin to run until the death of the husband.

In Hall v. Vandegrift, 8 Binn. 374, the principle is laid down that "it is the spirit of the Act of Limitations to allow twenty-one years from the time that a person might make an entry and support an action, the Statute not stopping after it has begun to run, in consequence of infancy, coverture or any other disability. But if a party has not a right of entry, but only a possibility which may give a right of entry at a future day, the Statute does not run against him until that right accrues.

Commercial paper.

It begins to run upon a demand note in favor of the maker, at its date. Shutts v. Pingar, 100 N. Y. 530, 1 Cent. Rep. 781.

It runs from the date of actual delivery, and not from the date it bears. Collins v. Driscoll, 69 Cal. 550.

In a suit on a certificate of deposit it does not begin to run until demand for its payment. Smiley v. Fry, 1 Cent. Rep. 510, 100 N. Y. 282.

In contracts.

On an agreement with an attorney, prescription for the fee agreed upon begins from the collection of the claim. Shepherd v. Dickson, 38 La. Ann. 741.

On agreement between debtor, creditor and a third person for delivery of property of the debtor for sale, the Statute does not begin to run in favor of the creditor until a reasonable time for making the sale. Smith v. Waynesburg Exchange Bank, 1 Cent. Rep. 501, 110 Pa. 508.

In an action for breach of covenant in not executing bonds for deferred payments, it begins from the date of the breach. Davis v. McMullen, 13 Va. L. J. 712.

It begins to run against sureties from payment of the judgment obtained against them, not from its rendition. Glass v. Williams, 16 Lea, 697.

It will not begin to run against one who pays at the request of another until he has been compelled to pay his assumed obligation. Wheeler v. Young, 3 New Eng. Rep. 816, 143 Mass. 143.

A debt from a town, where a bounty is awarded for enlisting, is not due until demand. Smith v. Franklin, 61 Vt. 385.

On contract to account.

In cases of mutual and open current accounts, the cause of action accrues at the time of the true date of the last item. Abbey v. Hill, 64 Miss. 340.

Limitation does not run as between partners until settlement of the accounts and agreement as to a balance (Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 596), or until the partnership has ceased to exist. Horne v. Ingraham, 14 West. Rep. 567, 123 Ill. 198.

On subscription to corporate stock.

A claim against stockholders on their personal liability does not accrue, in Alabama, until the dissolution of the corporation. McDonell v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 85 Ala. 401.

In the absence of a contract to make subscriptions payable at a future time, they become due and payable at once. William v. Meyer, 41 Hun. 545.

If payment is to be made upon call, and no call is made, the obligation is continuing, and the Statute must be set in motion by some adverse action. Thompson v. Reno Sav. Bank, 19 Nev. 171.

The Statute does not run until a call has been made, although the corporation has become insolvent, or until a decree of court calling for such subscriptions. Vanderwerken v. Glenn (Va.) 13 Va. L. J. 91; Glenn v. Foote, 36 Fed. Rep. 324.

If the corporation will not make the call, a court of chancery will make it. Glenn v. Howard, 51 Ga. 383.

Time does not begin to run against the right of the owner of bank stock to the dividends thereon until a demand of such dividends. Louisville Bank v. Gray, 84 Ky. 555.

In actions for torts.

The Statute of Limitations begins to run against a cause of action founded on a tort when the wrongful act causing damage is done, although the damages may not all have been sustained at the time. Raynor v. Mintzer, 72 Cal. 585.

So, in cases of trespass, from the time of the trespass. Valley R. Co. v. Franz, 2 West. Rep. 331, 43 Ohio St. 623.

So for mesne profits, which accrue when the trespass is committed. Herreshoff v. Tripp, 1 New Eng. Rep. 46, 15 R. I. 98.

But for a continuing trespass, action may be brought at any time until the trespasser has acquired a presumptive estate. Valley R. Co. v. Franz, supra.

The Statute runs on a cause of action for wrongful action from the time of the wrong. McCusker v. Walker, 77 Cal. 208.

And, in conspiracy, from the time of the last overt act. Ochs v. People, 14 West. Rep. 679, 124 Ill. 309.

For injuries resulting from a defective bridge, from the date of the injury. Wabash Co. v. Pearson, 120 Ind. 436.

For maliciously burning a building, from the time of the injury. Gale v. McDaniel, 72 Cal. 324.

In a case of conversion and wrongful sale of property, from the date of the sale. Moses v. Taylor (D. C.) 11 Cent. Rep. 724.

But where conversion is shown by proof of demand and refusal, then from date of demand. Ibid.

The Statute begins to run against a claim against the State for damages from the operation of canals, on its withdrawal from the board of appraisers; and subsequent ineffectual proceedings therein do not revive it or suspend the running of the Statute. McDougall v. State, 11 Cent. Rep. 917, 108 N. Y. 73.

It commences to run against an action for depreciation in value of property by the construction and operation of a railroad in an adjoining street, from the time the tracks are laid (Lyles v. Texas & N. O. R. Co. 73 Tex. 95), or at the time of the occupation of the street, and is barred in the prescribed number of years from that time. Frankie v. Jackson, 30 Fed. Rep. 366.

In regard to its right of entry upon land, the Statute runs after condemnation for a right of way. Walsh v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. 1 West. Rep. 393, 19 Mo. App. 127.

In criminal cases.

In criminal cases the Statute begins to run from the commission or consummation of the crime. United States v. Owen, 32 Fed. Rep. 534.

In an instantaneous crime, as arson or homicide, it begins to run with the consummation; in a continuous crime, as carrying weapons, it begins to run with the cessation of the act. Id.

Hence, notwithstanding the next heir in tail releases to the tenant in tail in possession, the Statute does not run against the releasor until the death of the tenant in tail without issue."

The principle indicated in these cases could be fortified, were it necessary, by copious citations, not only from the text-books, but from the decisions both in this country and in England; but I apprehend the law is too well settled to require it.

Care v. Keller, 77 Pa. 487, was cited with much confidence in support of the opposite view; but a careful examination of it shows that it is not authority for the principle contended for by the defendant. It is true the broad principle is there asserted "that the Statute of Limitations of 1785 applies to an action of dower, unde nihil habet, brought by a widow for property of which her husband had been seised, but which he had alienated before his death." This principle is not denied, and, had the plaintiff delayed her action for twenty-one years after her husband's death, I concede her right of action would have been barred by the Statute.

This was precisely the case in Care v. Keller. There the plaintiff claimed as the widow of John Keller. Her husband sold the real estate by articles of agreement to George Keller. This contract was afterwards enforced specifically by a decree of the orphans' court. John Keller, the vendor, died in March, 1846, George Keller, his vendee, moved on the premises the following April, and remained in possession as owner until 1848, when the administrator for John made him a deed for the property in pursuance of the decree of the orphans' court for specific performance. The widow brought her suit for dower within twenty-one years from the date of the deed, but more than twenty-one years from the time when George Keller took possession of the land under his contract, and the court held that her right of action accrued "when the vendee, by some unmistakable act or declaration, after the death of the vendor, asserted his right under the contract, and claimed the ownership of the land," and that the estate was equitably converted by the contract, and specific performance under the decree related back to the contract of sale in giving effect to the rights acquired under it. That the question we are now discussing was not raised or considered in that case is clear, from the foregoing review of it. The widow's right accrued, and was lost by her failure to prosecute it within twenty-one years.

It requires but a cursory examination of the Act of 1785 to see that it applies only to cases where a right of entry or a right of action has accrued, and that the Statute commences to run only from that time. This has been expressly decided. Hall v. Vandegrift, supra; Shepley v. Lytle, 6 Watts, 500; Poe v. Foster, 4 Watts & S. 355; Masple v. Myers, 12 Pa. 125.

It was not error, therefore, for the learned judge below to refuse the defendant's first point as applicable to this case. He correctly said in answering it that the Statute began to run from the death of plaintiff's husband, and for this reason the point did not apply to the facts of the case. Nor was there error in refusing defendant's second point. It assumed a fact not in the case, viz., that the property had been held adversely to the husband for more than twenty-one years before suit brought. There was no such adverse holding. On the contrary, the defendant held under the title of the husband, and not adversely to it. There is no analogy between such case and that of a disseisor who has turned husband and wife out of possession, and holds adversely to them for twenty-one years. In such case the title and seisin of the husband is destroyed, and with the destruction of the husband's title the right of the wife to dower falls with it. So, if the premises are sold by a judicial sale for the husband's debt. In such case the purchaser takes and holds adversely to his title. But, where a husband makes a voluntary conveyance of his title to a purchaser without his wife joining therein, her rights do not pass by such conveyance; her right of action does not accrue until her husband's death, and the Statute does not run against her until then.

THE BRADSTREET COMPANY.

A commercial agency is not exempted from liability for gross negligence in erroneously giving the financial standing of a person, in consequence of a typographical error, by a provision in its contract with subscribers that the company shall not be liable for any loss or injury caused by the neglect or other act of any officer or agent of the company in procuring, collecting and communicating said information, and that such company does not guarantee the correctness of said information.

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas, No. 8, for Philadelphia County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for losses alleged to have resulted to plaintiffs in consequence of their acting upon certain information furnished them by defendant. Reversed.

Defendant is an incorporated commercial agency. As such it entered into a contract with plaintiffs by which it agreed to procure for plaintiffs, to the best of its ability, information concerning the responsibility and character of mercantile persons inquired for. In consideration of the compensation which plaintiffs were to give to defendant they were entitled to the loan of certain books which were published by defendant and which purported to contain the financial standing of persons and corporations engaged in business.

Under the contract plaintiffs received from defendant a book which was published in July, 1884.

NOTE.—Mercantile agency.

In the conduct and management of its business a mercantile agency must be subjected to the ordinary rules of law, and its proprietors and managers held to the liability which the law attaches to the acts of others. King v. Patterson, 8 Cent. Rep. 367, 40 N. J. L. 417.

Subsequently plaintiffs had an opportunity to sell goods to a corporation called the Union Refining & Manufacturing Company on a thirty days' acceptance.

They consulted defendant's book and found that it stated that that company had $600,000 capital paid in, and upon the faith of this statement they accepted the offer and shipped the goods.

When the draft became due it was not paid and the Union Refining Company was then insolvent, and it appeared that the company, although having an authorized capital of $600,000, had only $20,000 of capital paid in and an indebtedness at the time the report was made of $5,000.

The court below entered a nonsuit which the court in banc refused to take off and plaintiffs thereupon took this writ.

Mr. Theodore F. Jenkins, for plaintiffs in error:

The contract provides for the negligence of "any officer or agent of the Company," but not for the negligence of the Company. There is a very broad distinction between the act of a corporation and the act of an agent or officer of a corporation.

Culver v. Reno Real Estate Co. 91 Pa. 367; Allegheny County Workhouse v. Moore, 95 Pa. 40; Wright's App. 99 Pa. 425; American Steamship Co. v. Landreth, 103 Pa. 181; Duncan v. Dun, 7 W. N. C. 246.

The special report and the answer to the plaintiff's request for an explanation of the discrepancy between the special report and the book, show that the agent of the defendant had obtained and communicated correctly the information as to the paid-in capital of the Refining Company, and that the defendant negligently did not publish in the book the information communicated to it by its agent.

It is against public policy to allow any person, natural or artificial, to contract against liability for negligence.

Camden & A. R. Co. v. Baldauf, 16 Pa. 67-77; American Exp. Co. v. Sands, 55 Pa. 140; Grogan v. Adams Exp. Co. 5 Cent. Rep. 298, 114 Pa. 523.

Where one man engages with another to supply him with a particular thing, to be applied to a certain use, in consideration of a pecuniary payment, he enters into an implied contract that the thing shall be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it is to be used, and shall not contain any defect unfitting it for such purpose, which might have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence, or by ordinary inquiry and examination.

8 Addison, Cont. 497, § 401.

Ordinary negligence is the absence of such care as was reasonably required under the circumstances of the particular case, and is a question for the jury.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Peters, 8 Cent. Rep. 405, 116 Pa. 206.

Messrs. Sharp & Alleman, for defendant in error:

A mercantile agency is not liable for a loss to a subscriber acting upon information collected by its agents and communicated by them to him under his written contract with the agency, wherein it is expressly agreed that the information to be given subscribers is mainly obtained and communicated by servants, clerks, attorneys and employes appointed as the sub-agents of the subscriber, and expressly providing that the mercantile agency shall not be responsible for any loss caused by the neglect of any of the servants, attorneys, clerks and employes.

Duncan v. Dun, 7 W. N. C. 246; Bradstreet v. Hoerson, 72 Pa. 124; Bullitt v. Baird, 27 Leg. Int. 171.

One may contract for indemnity against the negligence of his servants or agents or even his own negligence.

Wood, Ins. 2d ed. pp. 274-286; Cumberland Valley Mut. Protection Co. v. Douglas, 58 Pa. 419; Phenix F. Ins. Co. v. Cochran, 51 Pa. 143; Citizens Ins. Co. v. Marsh, 41 Pa. 387; Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 831 (28 L. ed. 717); Karow v. Continental Ins. Co. 57 Wis. 56.

The suit at bar was prematurely brought. The most that could be fairly claimed of us would be that we guaranteed the subscriber against loss which is the result of our negligence. Pursuit to insolvency, or proof that this would be useless, is essential to recovery against the Company.

See Brown v. Brooks, 25 Pa. 210; also Leet v. Hoge, 2 Watts, 128; Reigart v. White, 52 Pa. 438; Kramph v. Ilatz, 52 Pa. 525; Rudy v. Wolf, 16 Serg. & R. 79; Gilbert v. Henck, 30 Pa. 205; Kirkpatrick v. White, 29 Pa. 176.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not denied that the book furnished the plaintiffs by the Bradstreet Company contained a serious error. The Union Refining & Manufacturing Company, of Jersey City, was therein rated as having $600,000 capital actually paid in, whereas, in fact, that was the amount of its authorized capital, while only $20,000 had been paid in. This was explained by the Bradstreet Company as a typographical error. The plaintiffs allege that, on the faith of the statement contained in the book, they sold the Union Refining & Manufacturing Company a bill of merchandise amounting to $1,457.47, which has been wholly lost by reason of the insolvency of said company.

The defendant contends that it is protected by the following provision of its contract with the plaintiffs: "That the said Company shall not be liable for any loss or injury caused by the neglect or other act of any officer or agent of the Company in procuring, collecting and communicating said information; that the said Company does not guarantee the correctness of said information," etc.

Contracts against liability for negligence are not favored by the law. In some instances, such as common carriers, they are prohibited as against public policy. In all cases such contracts should be construed strictly, with every intendment against the party seeking its protection. This contract provides for exemption from the negligence of the officers and agents of the Company, but not from its own. We think the fair and reasonable construction of it is that the Company should not be liable for the mistakes of those who collect and impart the information. Thus, if the Company had been informed by the person who gave them the report as to the Union Refining & Manufacturing Company, that it had $600,000 of paid-up capital, and this statement had been furnished as received, we think the defendants would not have been responsible. Information as to the financial standing of individuals, firms and corporations is sometimes difficult to procure, and cannot, in all instances, be entirely accurate. It is a delicate inquiry always, and involves the employment of a large number of agents scattered over a wide extent of country. In some instances the information furnished may not only be erroneous, but willfully false to gratify the private malice of the informant against the subject of the inquiry.

The contract referred to was evidently intended to protect the Company from the consequence of errors from whatever cause in the collection and transmission of such information by its agents. Hence, if the Company communicates such information as it has received, it may well claim protection under the contract, even though such information should subsequently appear to have been erroneous. Its duty is to give the information which it receives in good faith to its customers, or to those who apply for it. In this case, however, the contention is that the report made to the Company by its agent was correct, and that the mistake was the blunder of the Company in having it erroneously printed in its July book. This book was certainly issued by the Company; it cannot be said to be the act of any particular officer or agent, as would be the sending of information as to the standing of a particular individual, or the transmission of such information by a clerk, in the course of his routine duties, to a subscriber or customer. The contract was against the negligence of particular officers or agents, not against the negligence of the Company as such. It was certainly negligence on the part of the Company to issue a book containing such a gross error; not the error of the agent who furnished the information, for he furnished it truly, but of the Company in sending it out falsely.

It was urged, however, that the Bradstreet Company, if liable at all, was only so as guarantor, and that as the plaintiffs had commenced no suit against the refining company, they are not entitled to recover against the defendant in this action. We need not discuss this proposition, in view of the evidence that the refining company is insolvent.

1. A patent right is property within the meaning of the Act of May 1, 1876, which permits the contribution of property to the capital of a limited copartnership.

2. A description of letters-patent in the schedule required by the Act of May 1, 1876, to be made of property contributed to a limited partnership concern, by giving its respective numbers in the United States Patent Office, together with the name of the inventor and the date and title of the patent, is sufficient.

3. Different letters-patent, which are useful only as they unite in forming a single device, may all be considered and valued together in adjusting the valuation thereof which is to be placed in a limited partnership schedule.

4. The fact that the valuation placed on property contributed to a limited partnership concern and inserted in the schedule is grossly excessive will not remove the limitation upon the partner's liability if it was made honestly and in good faith and through a mistaken idea of the true value of the property.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 3, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendants in an action to collect the debt of a dissolved partnership from defendants as general partners thereof. Affirmed.

The case fully appears in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph M. Pile, for appellants:

The Act of 1876 requires subscriptions to be certified according to the fact.

The mingling of these patents, and putting one gross sum on all, is a lumping surmise. It is not sufficient to insert lumping valuation in the articles.

If the defendants failed to comply with the requisites of the Act they became general partners and were liable as such.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Act of June 2, 1874, Pub. Laws, 371, requires persons desiring to form a limited partnership or association to file with the recorder of deeds a statement in writing, duly signed and acknowledged, in which shall be set forth the full names of the persons associated, with the amount of capital subscribed by each; the total amount of the capital, and when and how to be paid; the character of the business and the location of the same; the name of the association, with the word "Limited" added thereto; the contemplated duration of the association, not exceeding twenty years, and the names of the officers selected in conformity with the provisions of the Act. This Act contemplated that the subscriptions to the capital should be payable in cash (Maloney v. Bruce, 94 Pa. 249); but by the supplemental Act of May 1, 1876, Pub. Laws, 89, it was provided that it should be lawful "to make contributions to the capital thereof, in real or personal estate, mines or other property, at a valuation to be approved by all the members subscribing to the capital of such association;" provided, that in the statement, "subscriptions to the capital, whether in cash or in property, shall be certified in this respect according to the fact; and when property has been contributed as part of the capital, a schedule containing the names of the parties so contributing, with a description and valuation of the property so contributed, shall be inserted."

The Automatic Overseaming Buttonhole Machine Company, Limited, was organized under the Act of 1874 and its supplements; the statement filed is in due form and sets forth in detail the various matters required. The capital is fixed at $500,000, of which $496,970 is contributed by Charles R. Deacon, "in property at a valuation approved by all the members of the association subscribing to the capital thereof; a schedule containing the name of the party contributing said property, with a description and valuation of the property so contributed," being inserted as follows:

"Property contributed by Charles R. Deacon, as follows:

"Letters-Patent of the United States, No. 286,939, for Improvements in Buttonhole Attachments for Sewing Machines, dated October 23, 1883, granted to the 'Banks Buttonhole Machine Company, Limited,' Assignee of Charles M. Banks.

"Letters-Patent of the United States, No. 287,213, for Improvements in Buttonhole Sewing Machines, dated October 23, 1883, granted to the 'Banks Buttonhole Machine Company, Limited,' Assignee of Charles M. Banks.

"Letters-Patent of the United States, No. 805,657, for Improvements in Buttonhole Sewing Machines, dated September 23, 1884, granted to Charles M. Banks, and assigned to the 'Banks Buttonhole Machine Company, Limited,' October 12, 188—.

"Right, title and interest in three certain letters-patent of the Dominion of Canada, for the same inventions patented in the United States by letters-patent No. 286,939, dated October 23, 1883, No. 287,213, dated October 23, 1883, and No. 805,657, dated September 23, 1884, said Canadian letters-patent having been granted but not delivered owing to models not having been supplied.

"And which letters-patent, rights and interests are valued at the sum of four hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and seventy dollars ($496,870), by all the members of the association subscribing to the capital stock thereof. The balance of said capital, to wit, three thousand and thirty dollars ($3,030), has been paid in cash by the members contributing the same."

It will be observed that these letters-patent are scheduled and described by giving their respective numbers in the Patent Office of the United States, the name of the inventor, the date of the patent and its title. The Canadian letters-patent "for the same inventions," not yet issued, were described for identification by their numbers in the United States Patent Office, and as the right was not yet absolute, the schedule covered the right, title and interest of the member contributing the same. No more complete, accurate and definite description could have been made, as a reference to the several numbers in the Patent Office would disclose every particular respecting the nature of the patents and validity of the same. These inventions, moreover, were considered valuable only in combination; one of them, as we understand, covered the foundation principle of the invention, and the others were in aid of its practical operation. The patents, although distinct, were considered useful only as they united in the completion and operation of a single device embodying the principle of all three combined. In adjusting the valuation of these patents, therefore, they were properly considered and valued together. The contributor of these patents seems to have acted in trust for himself and others, but no question is raised as to that. But it is objected, first, that patent rights are not "personal estate" or "property" within the meaning of the Act of 1876, and second, if they are, there was no proper valuation of these patents inserted in the schedule.

Property is corporeal or incorporeal; one may be said, with equal propriety, to have property in a farm or a horse, or in an easement, a franchise or in letters-patent. A patent right is the subject of assignment, sale and inheritance. It may not, perhaps, be liable to a sale on a common-law execution, as it has no visible and tangible existence, and is a species of property which is incapable of manual seizure; but the highest courts in New York and California have affirmed the power upon a creditor's bill to order the assignment and sale of a patent right for the payment of the patentee's judgment debts (see Gillett v. Bate, 86 N. Y. 87; Pacific Bank v. Robinson, 57 Cal. 520), and the same power was sustained in Ager v. Murray, 105 U. S. 156 (26 L. ed. 942), 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 409, in the Supreme Court of the United States, where Jr. Justice Gray, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "A patent or a copyright, which vests the sole and exclusive right of making, using and vending the invention, or of publishing and selling the book, in the person to whom it has been granted by the government, as against all persons not deriving title through him, is property, capable of being assigned by him at his pleasure, although his assignment, unless recorded in the proper office, is void against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees for a valuable consideration," without notice.

In England it has long been held that a patent right would pass by assignment in bankruptcy even without expressed words to that effect in the Bankrupt Act. Hesse v. Steenson, 8 Bos. & P. 565. See also Curtiss, Patents, § 174, and Ager v. Murray, supra, and cases there cited.

We think there can be no question that a patent right is such property as may be contributed to the capital of a limited partnership association, within the meaning of the Act of 1876. All property thus contributed is to go into the capital "at a valuation to be approved by all the members subscribing to the capital," and the valuation so made is to be inserted in the statement.

In Maloney v. Bruce, 94 Pa. 249, it was held that if parties seek to have all the advantages of a partnership, and yet limit their liability to creditors, they must comply strictly with the Act of June 2, 1874. The object of the Act of May 1, 1876, requiring a schedule of the property contributed, it was said, was to enable creditors to ascertain precisely of what the property consists, and to judge of its value, and that where property has not been scheduled and valued there is no payment of the capital. In that case, the property contributed was, "A contract with the Pennsylvania Globe Gas Light Company, at the valuation of $3,500; merchandise, consisting of iron, steel, tin and copper wire, gas pipes, etc., all the goods, tools and chattels now on the premises, 209 Lackawanna Avenue, Scranton City," etc. "This," says the court, in that case, "is not the kind of schedule contemplated by the Act of 1876. The description is too general to enable anyone to form a correct estimate of the extent of the property, and the lumping valuation renders it equally difficult to judge of the values. The property contributed was intended as the equivalent of the cash capital, and the plain object of the provision in the Act of 1876, requiring a schedule, was to enable creditors to ascertain precisely of what the property consisted and to judge of its value."

In Vanhorn v. Corcoran, 127 Pa. 255, 4 L. R. A. 886, we held that where property is contributed, it must be property valuable for the business of the company and for the payment of its creditors, and the certificate must set forth in its statement such a description of the property contributed as will enable creditors to ascertain precisely of what the property consists, and to judge of its value.

In that case, the statement showed a subscription of property "paid in merchandise, lumber, book accounts and bills receivable transferred to the association, $21,609.18, and in cash, $3,890.82, making a total subscription of $25,000." It appeared that the $21,609.18 represented the difference between the estimated assets and liabilities of the firm subscribing to the capital of the association, and if the statement had certified, in this respect, correctly "according to the fact," the organization would have been defective; and the certificate was held to be insufficient.

In Shible v. Strong, 128 Pa. 815, the subscription was of "machinery to be valued and accepted," but there was no schedule, and it was held that the recorded statement must show a schedule with a detailed description and valuation of the machinery as required by the Act of 1876, otherwise the members will be held as general partners. "The question," says our brother Sterrett, in delivering the opinion of the court, "is not one of good faith on the part of the defendants, or of notice to the creditors, but whether, in their attempt to form a limited partnership, they conformed to the law; if they did not, their attempt was abortive, and it is no difference that creditors had actual knowledge of the facts required to be set out in the required statement."

But where, as here, the statement is in due form and contains all the essential requirements of the Statute, but the valuation is alleged to be unconscionable, and inserted in the statement without any proper consideration of the inherent or intrinsic worth of the property contributed, the question is one of good faith. All property contributed, under the Act of 1876, is to go into the capital "at the valuation to be approved by all the members subscribing to the capital," and the subscribers would not be justified, perhaps, in fixing a grossly fictitious and fraudulent valuation to mislead and defraud creditors. But if their estimate is made honestly and in good faith, it must be accepted, although mistaken, and even grossly excessive. Their motives must be considered as of the time when the valuation was made; it will not do to condemn their estimate of the property because it afterwards proved worthless, and the enterprise resulted in a disastrous failure. In this case there is no evidence of fraud. The members of the association seem to have believed these patents to have been of extremely great value. One fifth interest in the original invention cost $10,000; the remaining four fifths were held by Mintzer and Banks, and the entire patent was thus contributed to the association.

The design of the association was to manufacture extensively a device attachable to the ordinary sewing machine, for working buttonholes, which, it was believed, would come into universal use, not only for factory, but for family uses. Banks' invention worked the buttonhole, but did not cut the cloth; a cutter attachment was afterwards perfected and turned into the Association, and then the device not only cut the cloth, but worked the buttonholes in a very perfect manner. When this device was attached to the sewing-machine, however, the needle had to be lengthened, and the operation of the machine was impaired somewhat from the vibration of the needle.

Major Moore was asked: "What were those patents worth at that time, independent of your patent and your improvements?"

A. That is a very indefinite question; no man can tell the value of a patent until it is tried. Mr. Banks' patent involved what I regarded as of very great value—a slide that moves straight forward, stops, a disc turns and moves that again in the same direction—a thing that had never been done before, and for which he holds the button patent. That I regarded as very valuable.

Q. Did you ever have an idea yourself that those patents were worth any such sum of money?

A. Yes, sir, I did. If you want to know the reason, I will tell you.

Q. I would like to have it.

A. A patent, as I said, is worth just what it will be able to earn. That patent, which was the ground-floor patent, contemplated in its construction of going into every household in this country, if it could have been made to do it; and I believed at the time it could have been done; and when you contemplate what a country this is, and other countries beside, if we could produce a machine of that kind, by which a woman could change that by removing four screws, make her buttonholes, then change it back into a plain sewing-machine, we thought that would be a very valuable patent. Mr. Rehfuß tried it years before. It was the making of the American Sewing-Machine Company, and we believed it was valuable. Otherwise we would not have stepped up and put down our money.

Q. The reason why you believed those patents were worth that enormous sum of money was because you expected in the future to perfect that improvement and to put, as you say, the machine in every house in the country?

A. We did.

Q. It was the expectation of being able to do that, that made the patents, in your mind, valuable?

A. Yes, sir. It is the earning capacity of that machine that made it valuable. I have never sold a share of stock in that company, from the time it was organized under Banks up to the present time; and I think I have $20,000 in it. That shows what my faith has been in it. I never offered a share of stock for sale. No man ever bought a share of stock from me, and I am still spending money on it.

Q. You are the proprietor of the patents now?

A. Yes, sir; and I have still the same faith I had before. I want to say further, with reference to these patents, what my experience has been. The earning capacity of a patent, if you can get it right, is very great. The first buttonhole machine that I was in was not a success, although a contract was made with the Singer Company to put it on all their machines. That company transferred the principle it had in that buttonhole machine into a company. The device on it does not cost $10, and yet it has been earning the interest of a million dollars. We went out of that company and organized another company, for which we paid $2,000, three of us, and four of us went into it and organized a company on the basis of $50,000. I have taken out of that in the last four years about $12,000. It is not what you think a thing is worth, to look at it; it is what you think it will earn. You would not give me a five-cent piece for that to look at it. That cost ten dollars to put on a sewing machine; yet, I tell you, that under the control of two companies, a combination was formed to put that on a sewing machine, and yet it has earned the interest of a million dollars. I do not know whether it has not paid more than that—two million dollars; because, on one side, I cannot tell how much they get. The other side has paid 10 per cent on $800,000. That patent did not cost $10 to make.

Q. Then you got together with those other gentlemen, Mr. Long, Mr. Gray, Mr. Shipley, Mr. Deacon and Mr. Williamson, and signed an agreement agreeing that that patent was worth $496,970.

A. We did.

Q. How did you get just that amount of money? How did you fix that?

A. I do not know how it was done. The original value was fixed by Dr. Mintzer and Banks, and we accepted the situation as they made it.

This testimony illustrates the great degree of confidence which the members of the association had in the success of their enterprise, and in the value of these patents. It appears that the same patents had previously been put into what was known as the Banks Buttonhole Machine Company at the valuation of $500,000. This valuation was made by Dr. Mintzer and Charles M. Banks, the owners of the patents. That company, whilst endeavoring to perfect the action of this device, had some differences arise between its members, and went into liquidation, and the re-organization was effected under the name of the Automatic Overseaming Buttonhole Company, Limited, the patents being put in at the same price, less the amount of cash contributed.

Dr. Mintzer testified that when Banks sold his patents, the device worked quite satisfactorily. He says: "We most clearly defined satisfactorily a principle, but oftentimes it wants close adjustment before it will do practical work. Such was the position when Mr. Banks sold his patents."

He says, further, that he regarded the Banks patent as involving an exceedingly valuable principle, out of which he expected a very large sum of money would be realized; that their counsel was Mr. Connolly, a patent lawyer of very large experience, and, in fixing the valuation he deferred to the opinion of his counsel, but he joined in the certificate believing that it was all right and proper. Mr. Deacon testifies that the members of the association agreed to accept the valuation that had been placed upon the patents in the old company; that the capital was $500,000, and they decided to deduct the cash contributed, and the balance was agreed upon as the value of the patents. He says: "I believe the patents to be very valuable. I had considerable experience in the sewing-machine business, and I thought it was the best buttonhole I had seen, and on the strength of it I invested the money in the old company."

Charles B. Lee says he thought the patents were worth the amount of their valuation, or he would not have signed the papers or paid his money.

The case depends upon this testimony; there is practically nothing to support a charge of fraud. The testimony clearly shows that this enterprise was undertaken in good faith, and that the members had the utmost confidence in its final success. They paid in the cash capital and contributed as much more in aid of the enterprise. The whole trouble was, that, although the invention was valuable in mechanical conception and was a pioneer invention in its line, yet others, who were active in the same direction, relieved its imperfections and reaped the reward. The plaintiffs were not deceived. They knew the nature and character of the several contributions made to the association, for these contributions were certified upon the record according to the fact, and they had besides, actual, personal and intimate knowledge of the resources of the company. We are of opinion that this was a good-faith transaction, and the judgment should be affirmed.

Messrs. John B. Hinkson and Cyrus G. Derr, for appellants:

Under the Constitution of this Commonwealth the acquisition, possession and protection of property, and, as necessarily incidental thereto, the sale or exchange of it, are inherent and indefeasible rights which even the Legislature cannot invade; and an Act of Assembly which makes the owner of chattels, who desires to dispose of them, and with that view seeks a purchaser from house to house, guilty of a penal offense, is an invasion of those rights, and therefore void.

An Act of Assembly which prohibits the sale by the owner or his agent, in any part of this Commonwealth, of goods manufactured and owned by citizens of another State, is an interference with the exclusive right of Congress, under the Federal Constitution, to regulate interstate commerce, and is therefore void.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were employed at a salary by a manufacturing company in Rhode Island, to sell an article of merchandise called "Soapine." They came into the County of Schuylkill in the regular course of their employment, and as they say in the history of the case in their paper-book "were in the county temporarily for the purpose of selling this article as the agents of the manufacturers." When they had completed their canvass of the County of Schuylkill, they would, if continuing in the employment of the manufacturers, move on to another county, and subject its citizens to the same system of house-to-house visitation and personal solicitation.

By the Act of April 17, 1846, § 1, the sale of foreign or domestic goods, wares and merchandise in the County of Schuylkill by any person or persons as a hawker or peddler is forbidden. The defendants were arrested under this Act while engaged in selling soapine from house to house in Mahanoy City, and indicted. On the trial the jury rendered a special verdict, finding the defendants guilty of selling soapine from door to door, as the agents of the manufacturers, at a salary, with no personal interest in the goods or their proceeds, and submitted these facts to the judgment of the court. The theory of the defendants appears to have been that the manner in which their sales were made was of no consequence, if they did not own the articles sold, but acted as the agents of the owners. But it is the manner of sale that makes a peddler.

Webster defines a peddler as "one that carries about small commodities on his back, or in a cart or wagon, and sells them." In the Law Dictionary of Rapalje and Lawrence the word is defined thus: "Peddler, a person who carries goods from place to place for sale."

Whether the goods are the property of him by whom they are carried and offered for sale or of another who employs the seller, is of no possible consequence. The business of the itinerant vendor is the same in either case, and so is the inconvenience and annoyance he inflicts on others. The merchant or storekeeper is a resident, has a fixed place of business where his goods are shown to those who come in search of what they need, where he can be reached by process and compelled to make good his guaranty of the quality of his wares. The peddler is a transient with no fixed place of business, who seeks customers by invading their homes and makes sales by persuading people to buy what they do not need, and who by the time he is wanted to answer for his representations and engagements is out of sight and out of reach of process. It is this matter of tracking a laboring man or woman into the home and laying siege to him or her by an unscrupulous and self-possessed stranger, who is after money and has no delicate scruples about the manner in which he gets it, that has made the peddler a dread in the country and in the villages and has led the law-makers in this and other States to put the business under strict regulations when it is not wholly forbidden.

In this case the jury found that the defendants were doing that which exactly fills the definition of peddling, that is, carrying about from house to house small packages of goods and offering them for sale. It only remained for the court to pronounce upon the legal effect of the facts found and enter the appropriate judgment against the defendants as peddlers.

The next point taken by the defendants is that under the Constitution of the State an owner of goods has an indefeasible right to carry them when and where he pleases, in search of buyers. This conclusion seems to be drawn from a paragraph in the Declaration of Rights which asserts that all men have certain inherent and inalienable rights, among which is that of "acquiring, possessing and protecting property." But a distinction must be taken between the right and the manner of acquisition. The highwayman engages in his business with a view to acquire property, but the trouble is that his methods of acquisition are open to objection. The same is true of the gambler and the lottery dealer. Some business men have been known, in their zeal to acquire property, to use false weights and measures, but the law lays its hand on the methods they employ. It does not agree that the end justifies the means, and for that reason it punishes the highwayman, the gambler, the lottery dealer and the cheat, while it recognizes their constitutional right to "acquire, possess and protect property." Our laws relating to peddling are directed, not against the right of acquisition, but the manner in which some people exercise that right; not to the right of an owner to sell his goods, but to the manner in which he may sell them. Our Peddling Laws are therefore not in violation of the constitutional rights of the owners of goods, but are a wise exercise of the police power over the manner in which goods, wares and merchandise shall be sold. I do not regard the sale of the natural products of the soil by the farmer or gardener by whom they are raised as affected by the laws relating to peddlers. Farmers are not within the mischief which these laws were intended to remedy, except as they are the victims of that mischief. They are not traders or travelers in any legal sense. The carriage of the surplus products of the farm or garden to a market town, or from house to house, is not peddling, but it is incidental to their business as farmers. Peddlers are forbidden to sell "goods, wares and merchandise." These words were never intended to include farm products in the hands of the farmer; nor is the transportation of such products to a market for sale, or to regular customers who are supplied by the grower, the sort of business at which the laws relating to peddling are directed. The business they were intended to reach is very plainly indicated in section 1 of the Act of 1784, which declares: "Whereas, many idle and vagrant persons may come into this State, and under pretense of being hawkers and peddlers may greatly impose upon many persons," etc. The Act then provides for protecting the public from such fraudulent practices upon them by forbidding any person to engage in the business of peddling without a license. It is very clear that this prohibition was not directed against the farmer and his truck wagon, but against the itinerant vendor who carries his goods on his back, or in a cart or wagon, in search of customers. It was directed against him for the protection of the public against the impositions practiced by the class of dealers to which he belongs, in regard both to "the quality and price of goods" carried by them, and against the commission "of felonies and misdemeanors," by the vagrant persons who traveled the country "under pretense of being hawkers and peddlers." But while we are of opinion that farmers and gardeners are not within the letter or the spirit of our laws relating to peddling, this can in no way serve the defendants, for they are not farmers, and "soapine" is not a natural product of the soil. The special verdict assures us that it is a manufactured article, produced by the Kendall Manufacturing Company, all of whose stockholders are nonresidents of Pennsylvania, and whose factory is located in the State of Rhode Island.

On these facts, so found, the third and last question presented in this case is raised, viz., Is not the sale of soapine from door to door in Mahanoy City interstate commerce? This is broadly asserted, and the position is taken that our laws on the subject of peddling are an invasion of the exclusive right of Congress under the Federal Constitution to regulate interstate commerce, and therefore void. We have understood interstate commerce to refer to the free interchange of commodities between citizens of the different States without regard to state lines. If we are right about this, then the laws relating to peddling do not interfere with such interchange and cannot be an invasion of the authority of the United States. They erect no barrier at the state line, provide for no inspection or stoppage, and levy no tax on the introduction into, or transportation through, the State of any sort of property whatever. The citizen of another State may come into Pennsylvania when he will, and where he will, stay as long as he chooses, open as many places for the sale of his goods as he may see fit, and enjoy the same measure of freedom in regard to the conduct of his business as a native citizen. But when he comes within the State, permanently or temporarily, he is under the protection of its laws, and the correlative duty of obedience rests on him. His rights are equal to but not above those of the citizen. He has no more right to sell intoxicating drinks without a license than a citizen; no better right to sell cigarettes to children, or oleomargarine to customers in violation of law, than a citizen. He has no better right to take a pack on his back, or a horse and cart, and engage in the business of peddling than a citizen. To hold the contrary would be subversive of law and order, and would render the possession of the police power useless to the State. If it is true, as is now asserted, that the itinerant stranger who treads the country roads and, haunts the mining towns, carrying a pack or box filled with sham jewelry and worthless watches, to sell to those who are credulous enough to believe his representations, for many times their real value; and who as soon as he has "gone through" a neighborhood moves quickly out of reach—if it is true that such a person is the ward of the Federal Constitution, engaged in interstate commerce, with the power of the government of the United States interposed between him and the police power of the State, it must be admitted that we have stumbled on a startling and unlooked-for result of the investment of the general government with the power to regulate commerce. Fortunately the federal courts do not so hold. They distinctly recognize the police power of the States and their right to forbid altogether the sale of such articles as are injurious. Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678 [82 L. ed. 253].

The same doctrine was held in the Kansas cases arising under the prohibitory feature of the Constitution of that State. We think the questions in this case were rightly decided in the court below, and the judgment is affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

CITIZENS LOAN, FUND & SAVINGS ASSOCIATION of Bloomington, Appt.,

(...Ind....)

1. A lawyer cannot be held liable for a mistake in reference to a matter in which members of the profession possessed of reasonable skill and knowledge may differ as to the law, until it has been settled in the courts, nor if he is mistaken in a point of law on which reasonable doubt may be entertained by well informed lawyers.

2. A lawyer upon whose advice a mortgage was taken in 1883, executed by a husband and wife upon lands held by them as tenants by entireties, to secure the husband's debt, cannot be made liable for the loss occasioned by the death of the husband and the defeat by the wife of a foreclosure suit upon the ground that she signed as surety for her husband, although it was well settled when the mortgage was executed that the wife's signature was void, since it was not decided until 1884 that such a mortgage was void as to both husband and wife.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lawrence County in favor of defendants in an action upon the bond of an attorney-at-law to recover losses alleged to have resulted from his want of skill in his profession. Affirmed.

The facts fully appear in the opinion.

Messrs. London & Rogers for appellant.
Messrs. Buskirk & Duncan for appellees

Mitchell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted by the Citizens Loan, Fund & Savings Association, against Harmon H. Friedley, and the sureties on his bond, to recover money alleged to have been lost to the Loan Association on account of the negligence and want of skill of the defendant Friedley, while acting as the attorney of the Association.

It is averred that the Association made a loan of $400 to one of its shareholders in August, 1888, upon the faith of advice given by the appellee, its attorney, who certified to its officers, in writing, that the title to certain real estate upon which the applicant for the loan proposed to execute a mortgage as security therefor, was perfect and available to secure the loan applied for.

It appears that the real estate was owned by the applicant and his wife as tenants by the entireties; that the loan was made in reliance upon the advice of the attorney; that the borrower subsequently died, his estate being insolvent, and that his widow successfully resisted a suit for the foreclosure of the mortgage subsequently brought by the Association, her defense having been predicated upon the ground that she signed the note and mortgage merely as the surety for her husband.

It is insisted that the complaint shows that the Association sustained loss in consequence of the ignorance, carelessness or unskillfulness of its attorney, and that the latter, with his sureties, must therefore respond to it in damages for the amount lost. No neglect or want of skill appear, except that the attorney was mistaken as to the law applicable to the state of the title of the borrower, and its availability as a security for the loan. Attorneys are very properly held to the same rule of liability for want of professional skill and diligence in practice, and for erroneous or negligent advice to those who employ them, as are physicians and surgeons, and other persons who hold themselves out to the world as possessing skill and qualification in their respective trades or professions. Waugh v. Shunk, 20 Pa. 180.

The practice of law is not merely an art; it is a science which demands from all who engage in it, without detriment to the public, special qualifications, which can only be attained by careful preliminary study and training, and by constant and unremitting investigation and research. But as the law is not an exact science, there is no attainable degree of skill or excellence, at which all differences of opinion or doubts in respect to questions of law are removed from the minds of lawyers and judges. Absolute certainty is not always possible. "That part of the profession," said Lord Mansfield, in Pitt v. Yalden, 4 Burr. 2060, "which is carried on by attorneys, is liberal and reputable, as well as useful to the public, when they conduct themselves with honor and integrity, and they ought to be protected where they act to the best of their knowledge and skill. But every man is liable to error, and I should be very sorry that it should be taken for granted that an attorney is answerable for every error or mistake, and to be punished for it by being charged with the debt which he was employed to recover for his client." Wat- son v. Muirhead, 57 Pa. 161; U. S. Mortgage Co. v. Henderson, 111 Ind. 24, 34.

An attorney who undertakes the management of business committed to his charge thereby impliedly represents that he possesses the skill, and that he will exhibit the diligence ordinarily possessed and employed by well-informed members of his profession, in the conduct of business such as he has undertaken. He will be liable if his client's interests suffer on account of his failure to understand and apply those rules and principles of law that are well established and clearly defined in the elementary books, or which have been declared in adjudged cases, that have been duly reported and published a sufficient length of time to have become known to those who exercise reasonable diligence in keeping pace with the literature of the profession. Hullegas v. Bender, 78 Ind. 225, and cases cited; Pennington v. Yell, 11 Ark. 212, 52 Am. Dec. 262; Goodman v. Walker, 30 Ala. 482, 68 Am. Dec. 184; Weeks, Attorneys, §§ 284-289; Fenille v. Couderi, 44 N. J. L. 234; Gambert v. Hart, 44 Cal. 542.

Thus it has been said: "An attorney is liable for the consequences of his ignorance or non-observance of the rules of practice of the court he practices in, for the want of care in the preparation of a cause for trial; while, on the other hand, he is not answerable for an error in judgment upon points of new occurrence, or of nice or doubtful construction." Chitty, Cont. 482; Godefroy v. Dalton, 6 Bing. 460; Dearborn v. Dearborn, 15 Mass. 816.

It is his own fault, however, if he undertakes, without knowing what he needs only to use diligence to find out, or applies less than the occasion requires.

A lawyer is without excuse who is ignorant of the ordinary settled rules of pleading and practice, and of the statutes and published decisions in his own State; but he is not to be charged with negligence when he accepts as a correct exposition of the law a decision of the supreme court of his own State, nor can he be held liable for a mistake in reference to a matter in which members of the profession, possessed of reasonable skill and knowledge, may differ as to the law until it has been settled in the courts, nor if he is mistaken in a point of law on which reasonable doubt may be entertained by well informed lawyers. Marsh v. Whitmore, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 178 [22 L. ed. 482]; Kemp v. Burt, 1 Nev. & Man. 262.

Now, while it is quite true that § 5119, Rev. Stat. 1881, which took effect September 19, 1881, prohibited a married woman from entering into any contract of suretyship, and declared all such contracts void as to her, and while it had been thoroughly settled that a married woman who had joined in a mortgage of her separate property to secure the debt of her husband was to be regarded as his surety (Leary v. Schaffer, 79 Ind. 567), it had never been held prior to the 23d day of January, 1884, when the judgment in Dodge v. Kinsey, 101 Ind. 102, was pronounced, that a mortgage executed by a husband and wife, on lands held by them as tenants by entireties, was void as to both of them. It cannot fairly be said, therefore, that before the decision in Dodge v. Kinsey.

supra, was made and promulgated, so as to have become known by those reasonably diligent in the profession, it was such a mistake to advise that a husband and wife might secure a debt of the former on his estate in lands held by himself and wife as tenants by the entireties, as could only have resulted from the want of ordinary knowledge and skill, or from the failure to exercise reasonable care and caution. The error must be regarded as one into which any reasonably careful and prudent lawyer might have fallen, and therefore one for which the attorney was not liable.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

James I. JELLETT, Respt.,

W. A. RHODE, Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

*A parol lease of real estate for the term of one year, to commence in futuro, is invalid, being an agreement which by its terms is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof.

(April 17, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Municipal Court for the City of St. Paul in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover rent alleged to be due under a parol lease. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Thompson & Taylor, for appellant:

In Minnesota, no decision ever has been made directly upon the point, but it is well settled, upon statutes corresponding to that of Minnesota, that no action will lie upon an oral lease for the full term of one year to begin in futuro.

Ott v. Lohnas, 19 Ill. 576; Comstock v. Ward, 22 Ill. 248; Wheeler v. Frankenthal, 78 Ill. 124; Briar v. Robertson, 1 West. Rep. 456, 19 Mo. App. 66; Parker v. Hollis, 60 Ala. 411; Wolf v. Dozer, 22 Kan. 436; White v. Holland, 17 Or. 8; Atwood v. Norton, 81 Ga. 507; Roberts v. Tennell, 8 T. B. Mon. 247; Morehead v. Watkins, 5 B. Mon. 229; Crommelin v. Thiess, 81 Ala. 412; Delano v. Montague, 4 Cush. 42; Hawley v. Moody, 24 Vt. 608; Rawlins v. Turner, 1 Ld. Raym. 786; Riley v. Hicks, 1 Strange, 651.

The States which have held that an oral lease for one year to begin in futuro was valid and binding may be divided into two classes, dependent upon differences existing in their respective statutes.

In the first class are Indiana, Maryland and New Jersey, in which States, by an express provision of their Statute of Frauds, oral leases for a period not exceeding three years are valid; and so accounting for such holding.

See Huffman v. Starks, 81 Ind. 474; Union Bkq. Co. v. Gittings, 45 Md. 181; Birkhead v. Cummins, 83 N. J. L. 44.

*Head note by DICKINSON, J.

NOTE.—Lease; Statute of Frauds.

An oral lease for a longer period than that allowed by the Statute of Frauds has been held void only for the excess. Other authorities hold that it creates a tenancy from year to year (Rosenblat v. Perkins (Or.) 6 L. R. A. 267), and others a tenancy at will. Wolke v. Fleming, 108 Ind. 105, 1 West. Rep. 160.

In the second class are New York, Michigan and Wisconsin, where, by Statute, the provision, "No action shall be maintained . . . upon any agreement, not in writing, etc., which is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof," is made to apply only to "goods, chattels and things in action," thus accounting for all the decisions rendered in these States.

See Becar v. Flues, 64 N. Y. 518; Whiting v. Ohlert, 52 Mich. 462; Young v. Dake, 5 N. Y. 464, 468; Taggard v. Roosevelt, 2 E. D. Smith, 100.

Mr. S. C. Olmstead, for respondent.

That the infra annum clause of the Statute does not apply to agreements relating to land is held in the following cases among many others:

Lord Bolton v. Tomlin, 5 Ad. & El. 859; Grant v. Ramery, 7 Ohio St. 167; Sears v. Smith, 3 Colo. 290; Sobey v. Brisbee, 20 Iowa, 105; Jones v. Marcy, 49 Iowa, 188; Nash v. Berkmeir, 83 Ind. 586; Eaton v. Whitaker, 18 Conn. 231; Peuple v. Rickert, 8 Cow. 226; Clarke v. Serricks, 2 Up. Can. Q. B. 585; Young v. Dake, 5 N. Y. 464; Becar v. Flues, 64 N. Y. 518; Taggard v. Roosevelt, 2 E. D. Smith, 100; Whiting v. Ohlert, 52 Mich. 462; Steininger v. Williams, 68 Ga. 475; Brown v. Kayser, 60 Wis. 1. See 1 Sugd. Vind. chap. 4, § 1, note.

The Statute of this State is precisely the same as the Statutes of the States of New York, Michigan, Wisconsin and Colorado, and substantially the same as the Statutes of Georgia and Iowa; in all of these States the same question has arisen as the one involved in the case at bar, and in all those States it has been expressly held that oral leases for a term of one year, to commence in future, are valid.

Young v. Dake, 5 N. Y. 464; Becar v. Flues, 64 N. Y. 518; Whiting v. Ohlert, 52 Mich. 462; Brown v. Kayser, 60 Wis. 1; Sears v. Smith, 3 Colo. 288; Sobey v. Brisbee, 20 Iowa, 105; Jones v. Marcy, 49 Iowa, 188; Steininger v. Williams, 68 Ga. 475.

Dickinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

July 10, 1889, these parties entered into an oral agreement, the plaintiff leasing to the defendant certain real property for the term of one year from the 1st day of August at a yearly rental of $780, payable in monthly installments, in advance. The defendant entered into the occupancy of the premises on the first day of August, and remained in possession until the 28th of September, when he went out. This action is for the recovery of the stipulated monthly rental for the month of October, payable according to the terms of the agreement, on the 1st of that month.

A lease for more than a year, void under How. Stat., § 6179, because signed by a person other than the owner, not thereunto authorized by the owner in writing, is not aided by the fact that a duplicate lease retained by the owner was signed by him, but never delivered to the lessee or known of by him. Chesebrough v. Pingree (Mich.) 1 L. R. A. 629.

By the terms of our Statute of Frauds (title 2, chap. 41, Gen. Stat. 1878) no action is maintainable upon a mere parol agreement that by its terms is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof (§ 6); no estate or interest in lands, other than leases for a term not exceeding one year, nor any trust, etc., shall be created, unless by act or operation of law, or by deed or conveyance in writing, etc. (§ 10); and every contract for the leasing for a longer period than one year, or for the sale of any lands, or any interest in lands, shall be void unless the contract, or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration, is in writing, and subscribed by the party by whom the lease or sale is to be made, or by his authorized agent. § 12.

The agreement upon which this action is prosecuted is clearly within the language of section 6. By its terms the agreement was not to be performed within one year from its making. There is no reason why that section should not be deemed applicable to such a case as this, unless it is to be considered that the exception in section 10, and the implied exception in section 12, of leases "for a term not exceeding one year," or for a period not longer than one year, are effectual to exclude from the operation of section 6 leases for a term of one year, to commence in futuro. The reasons which led to the enactment of that part of section 6, above referred to, are as applicable to parol agreements leasing land not to be performed within one year, as in respect to any other kind of a contract. The evil result likely to follow from allowing such a contract, the performance of which is to be long postponed, to rest in parol, without any written evidence showing the terms of the agreement, are of the same nature, and just as likely to occur, as in the case of any other contract.

If a merely oral lease may be effectually made for a year to commence in futuro, it matters not how long the commencement of the term may be postponed. If such a case is not within the provision of section 6, then a lease may be thus made for a term to commence many years subsequent to the agreement. Such a case is so clearly within the plain, explicit language of section 6, and would so obviously involve the very evils to avoid which has been the well-understood purpose of this clause of the Statute of Frauds, that it should be construed as applicable, unless the other sections of the law very clearly manifest the intention to withdraw or exclude such cases from its operation. Such an intention is not manifest. Full effect may be given to the excepted cases in section 10, and to cases within the implied exception in section 12, consistently with the applicability of section 6 to parol leases for a term not to be completed within one year. "Leases for a term not exceeding one year," or for a period not longer than one year, may be made, if the term is to commence at once, and such a contract would not come under the terms of the Statute as to agreements not to be performed within one year. We see no sufficient reason, either from the terms or arrangement of the Statute, for excluding such cases as that before us from the operation of section 6. In this conclusion we are supported by the following authorities: Olt v. Lohnas, 19 Ill. 576; Wheeler v. Frankenthal, 78 Ill. 124; Wolf v. Dozer, 22 Kan. 436; Briar v. Robertson, 19 Mo. App. 86, 1 West. Rep. 456; Parker v. Hollis, 50 Ala. 411; Atwood v. Norton, 81 Ga. 507; White v. Holland, 17 Or. 8. See also Roberts v. Tennell, 8 T. B. Mon. 247.

The decisions upon the English Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II. chap. 8) have but little bearing upon the construction of our Statute, for the reason that by that Statute parol leases for a term not exceeding three years from the making thereof were authorized, and of course the provision in section 4 as to agreements not to be performed within one year could not be applicable to such cases. The same is true as to the Statute of Indiana, in which State parol leases like that under consideration are held valid.

In Young v. Dake, 5 N. Y. 463, it was held, overruling Oswell v. Crane, 7 Barb. 191 that such a lease was valid. The decision, however, was placed upon considerations which cannot be regarded under our Statute. One of these considerations was the fact that in the revision of the Statute the Legislature eliminated from the clause of the Statute of Frauds, excepting leases for a term not exceeding one year, the qualifying words, "from the making thereof," which was regarded as disclosing an intention to allow such a term to commence in futuro.

Again, it was considered that the statutory provision as to contracts which by their terms were not to be performed within one year was not applicable to contracts relating to leases of or interest in real estate, for the reason that the former provision was embraced in title 3 of the Statute, entitled "Of Fraudulent Conveyances and Contracts, Relative to Goods, Chattels and Things in Action," while the provisions in which parol leases of real estate were authorized are found in title 1, relating to "Fraudulent Conveyances and Contracts Relative to Lands."

This reason for the decision in Young v. Dake is not available under our Statute since the Revision of 1886, in which all of the provisions under consideration are embraced in one title denominated "Statute of Frauds."

In Michigan and Wisconsin the Statutes in this particular have been arranged and entitled as in New York, and in those States Young v. Dake has been followed, or cited with approval. It has also been followed in some other States, where the reasons upon which that decision was made were wholly inapplicable.

MISSISSIPPI & RUM RIVER BOOM CO.,
Respt.

- *1. The right to use a navigable river is a public, and not a private, right, and the owner of land on the stream cannot maintain an action for an illegal obstruction of navigation which prevents his use of this public right.
2. To entitle him to maintain a private action, the obstruction must constitute an invasion or violation of some private right, as distinguished from the public right which he has of navigating the river in common with the rest of the public.
3. Held, that certain of the causes of action were properly dismissed, because they did not state facts constituting special damage for which a private action would lie; and that the others were also properly dismissed, because the evidence did not tend to connect the injuries complained of with any illegal or negligent act of the defendant, or to show that they were the proximate result of any such act.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling a motion for new trial in an action to recover damages for the alleged unlawful obstruction of a navigable river, in which the several causes of complaint had been dismissed upon defendant's motion. Affirmed.

NOTE.—Navigable rivers, what are.

The common-law rule, making the ebb and the flow of the tide the test of navigability, is not now applicable to the United States. Weise v. Smith, 3 Or. 445; Hodges v. Williams, 95 N. C. 331. Compare Felger v. Robinson, 3 Or. 456; The Daniel Ball, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 557 (19 L. ed. 909); The Montello, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 411 (20 L. ed. 191); Chicago v. McGinnis, 61 Ill. 272; McManus v. Carmichael, 3 Iowa, 1; Bucki v. Cone (Fla.) 6 So. Rep. 160.

Tidal waters and rivers above tidewaters, which are in fact navigable the entire year, without reference to the manner or degree in which they are affected by the seasons, are presumptively public and navigable. Sullivan v. Spotswood, 23 Ala. 163.

The following have been judicially pronounced navigable rivers: the Androscoggin (Thompson v. Androscoggin Co. 54 N. H. 545; Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 266); the Allegheny (Dairymple v. Mead, 1 Grant, Cas. 197); the Delaware and the Lehigh (McKeen v. Delaware Div. Canal Co. 49 Pa. 424); the Falia (Ingram v. St. Tammany Police Jury, 20 La. Ann. 225); Hog Bayou (Sullivan v. Spotswood, 23 Ala. 163); the Mohawk (People v. Canal Appraisers, 33 N. Y. 461; Crill v. Rome, 47 How. Fr. 806); the Monongahela (Monongahela Bridge Co. v. Kirk, 46 Pa. 112); the Ohio (Porter v. Allen, 3 Ind. 1; Baker v. Lewis, 33 Pa. 301); the Passaic (Newark Aqueduct Board v. Passaic, 45 N. J. Eq. 393); the Pond Branch (Witt v. Beardsley, 2 Ind. 591); the Suwanee (Bucki v. Cone (Fla.) 6 So. Rep. 160); the Tualitin and the St. Mary (Weise v. Smith, 3 Or. 445); the Wallamet. Wallamet Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 19 Fed. Rep. 347.

In this country, as a general thing, all waters are deemed navigable which are really so, and especially L. R. A.

The sixth cause of action sought to recover damages for plaintiffs' being compelled to take wood, which they were floating down the river for use upon their premises, out of the river before it reached said premises, by reason of obstructions placed by defendant in the river, and convey the same to its place of destination over land.

The other causes of action are sufficiently set out in the opinion.

Messrs. Davis & Farnam, for appellants: The unlawful obstruction of a navigable stream is a common nuisance, subject to abatement in equity, and, where special injury has been sustained by a private citizen thereby, may be abated in equity or compensated for at law in damages at the instance of the citizen's private suit.

Co.* 83 Minn. 201; Barnum v. Minnesota Transfer R. Co. 83 Minn. 365; Shero v. Carey, 85 Minn. 423; Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 39 Minn. 286; Carroll v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. 40 Minn. 168; Brayton v. Fall River, 113 Mass. 229; Stetson v. Faxon, 19 Pick. 147.

If the injuries sustained by the plaintiffs are special, and the damages arising therefrom consequential, not necessarily direct, from the unlawful complained-of acts of the defendant in obstructing the navigable channel of the river, then the order of the trial court should be reversed.

Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers, in law, which are navigable in fact. The Montello, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 430 (22 L. ed. 391).

A stream below tide water, running into the Savannah River, one hundred feet wide and fourteen feet deep, is a navigable stream the obstruction of which is a nuisance. Charleston & S. R. Co. v. Johnson, 73 Ga. 303.

Test of navigability of rivers.

Capability of use by the public for purposes of transportation and commerce affords the true criterion of navigability of a river. The Montello, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 430 (22 L. ed. 391); Treat v. Lord, 43 Me. 552; Moore v. Sanborne, 3 Mich. 519; Spring v. Russell, 7 Me. 273; Browne v. Scofield, 8 Barb. 239; Tyler v. People, 3 Mich. 320; Wilson v. Forbes, 2 Dev. L. 30; Ingram v. Threadgill, 3 Dev. L. 59; Stuart v. Clark, 2 Swan, 2.

Every stream which in its natural state can be used for the purposes of commerce is a public navigable river. Walker v. Allen, 72 Ala. 456; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Brooks, 39 Ark. 403.

So a river made useful for commerce by improvements is a navigable river. Ibid.

To make a stream navigable, there must be some

Alison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542; Hughes v. Heiser, 1 Binn. 468.

So long as the plaintiffs were aware that the obstructions in the stream were such that they could not pass them, they were not bound to commit their property to the water and have it destroyed before recovery would lie; nor if they knew of them were they bound to refrain from attempting to navigate.

Martin v. Bliss, 5 Blackf. 85.

Rafts of the plaintiffs were, without any negligence upon the part of the plaintiffs' servants, destroyed through obstructions placed in the channel of the river, or, at least, created by logs over which the defendant exercised control and the care of which was exclusively its charge, and plaintiffs were entitled to recover the damages thereby resulting.

Bacon v. Arthur, 4 Watts, 487.

One who is forced by an obstruction to carry his cargo overland in order to reach a particular point, or to abandon his voyage, suffers peculiar damage, distinguishable from that inflicted upon the general public and entitling him to recover the additional expenses to which he is unlawfully subjected.

So long as damages are natural, even though not the necessary consequence of the wrongful acts, they are special in their character, and if specially averred, the complaint is sufficient, and, if proof be admitted and the fact established, will warrant a recovery at the hands of the jury.

Up to the present time this court has sustained no action, unless there appeared either that the only access to plaintiffs' premises was obstructed by the nuisance (Brakken v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 29 Minn. 41), or that there was a direct physical invasion of plaintiffs' property.

Wilder v. De Cou, 26 Minn. 10; Wilkin v. St. Paul, 38 Minn. 181.

In all the other cases, although the plaintiffs suffered inconvenience and pecuniary loss under various forms from the obstruction to the public way, yet the court held these injuries the same in kind, though not in degree, with those suffered by the public.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs allege that they were riparian owners of two tracts of land on the Mississippi River,—one in Anoka County, which they used as a yard for the manufacture of brick, and another in Wright County, thirty-five miles above, which they used for the purpose of piling wood, to be conveyed by river down to their brickyard; that the defendant, a corporation created by the laws of this State (Sp. Laws 1867, chap. 184), had wrongfully and unlawfully interfered with and obstructed the channel of the river by driving piles therein, fastening booms, and detaining large quantities of logs therein, thereby absolutely preventing the navigation of the river between plaintiffs' two tracts of land. Predicated upon this alleged illegal obstruction of the navigation of the river, plaintiffs set up eleven causes of action for damages. The first, second, third, such obstruction at its pleasure. Stockton v. Baltimore & N. Y. R. Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 9.

Police juries have no power to obstruct navigable watercourses by bridges without draws. Goodwill v. Police Jury, 38 La. Ann. 752; Wallamet Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 19 Fed. Rep. 847.

Unlawful obstructions a common nuisance.

Any obstruction which interferes with commerce between the States is unlawful. Silliman v. Troy & W. T. Bridge Co. 11 Blatchf. 274.

Any obstruction, whether by wharves, piers, bridges or other constructions, is a common or public nuisance. State v. Parrott, 71 N. C. 311; Re Water Comrs. 3 Edw. Ch. 290, 6 N. Y. Ch. Carter*, 9 Humph. 369; Selman v. Wolfe, 27 Tex. 68; Barnes v. Racine, 4 Wis. 454; Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 91 (9 L. ed. 1012).

So a boom erected in such waters is an unlawful obstruction. Atlee v. Northwestern Union Packet Co. 38 U. S. 21 Wall. 389 (22 L. ed. 619).

An obstruction of a river for six weeks during the season for navigation must be presumed to have been unreasonable. Enos v. Hamilton, 27 Wis. 256.

A pier erected without license or authority is an unlawful obstruction and subjects the owner to liability for damages caused by it. Atlee v. Northwestern Union Packet Co. supra.

The obstruction to floatage of logs by a dam is unlawful. Volk v. Eldred, 23 Wis. 410.

A rope stretched across the principal channel of a navigable river is an unlawful obstruction of navigation. The Swan, 19 Fed. Rep. 455.

But a temporary use of such a line in handling vessels is not necessarily unlawful (The Echo, 19 Fed. Rep. 453), as the temporary interruptions to navigation are not illegal. People v. Horton, 64 N. Y. 610.

Any obstruction incident to commerce is not unlawful. Cummins v. Spruance, 4 Harr. (Del.) 315.

A well-defined watercourse of running water, although dry at certain seasons, is within the doctrine against obstructions. Schneitzius v. Bailey, 11 Cent. Rep. 737, 45 N. J. Eq. 179.

Liability for wrongful obstruction.

If a person wrongfully obstructs a navigable stream, he is liable for the consequences. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & H. De G. Steam Tow Boat Co. 64 U. S. 23 How. 209 (16 L. ed. 438).

Obstructions in navigable streams within States are indictable as offenses against their laws, but not as against United States laws which do not exist. Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 126 U. S. 1 (31 L. ed. 629).

An unlawful obstruction to navigation is remediable by indictment or by abatement, or equity may take jurisdiction upon information filed by the attorney-general. Woodman v. Pitman, 4 New Eng. Rep. 702, 79 Me. 456.

Action of damages, when.

A public nuisance may also be a private nuisance; but before a person can sue he must have sustained special damage distinct from what he suffers in common with the public. Yolo Co. v. Sacramento, 36 Cal. 193; Crommelin v. Cox, 30 Ala. 318; Burrows v. Pixley, 1 Root, 362; Gates v. Blincoe, 2 Dana, 158; Seeley v. Bishop, 19 Conn. 128; Cole v. Sprowl, 35 Me. 151; Stetson v. Faxon, 19 Pick. 147; Barden v. Crocker, 10 Pick. 388; Runyon v. Bordine, 14 N. J. L. 472; Dougherty v. Bunting, 1 fourth, ninth and tenth are all alike, viz., that at the several dates named the plaintiffs had wood piled on their upper tract which they contemplated transporting by river to their brickyard below, but were prevented from doing so by these obstructions to navigation, and were compelled to leave it on the upper tract for over a year, whereby it became injured and depreciated in value. The eighth cause of action is not in principle different from these. It is that by these obstructions the plaintiffs were prevented from transporting a lot of wood by river from the upper to the lower tract, and were compelled to take it out of the river at a point where they were not owners of the shore, and were compelled to pay the riparian owner the sum of $50 for the privilege of doing so.

It is not alleged that the plaintiffs had started to transport the wood down the river not knowing of or anticipating the existence and effect of these obstructions before they embarked upon the use of the river. Hence it does not fall within the category of those cases where a person who has actually started to travel a highway or embarked on the navigation of a river is unexpectedly stopped by an obstruction, and is compelled to turn back, or is put to expense in removing the obstruction, which some authorities hold constitutes special damage for which a private action will lie, distinguishing it from a case where a person merely had the use of the highway in contemplation. Ross v. Miles, 4 Maule & S. 101. But see Winterbottom v. Lord Derby, L. R. 2 Exch. 816; Houck v. Wachter, 84 Md. 265; Blackwell v. Old Colony R. Co. 122 Mass. 1.

The eleventh cause of action is that plaintiffs, by reason of being thus prevented from transporting this wood by river to their brickyard, were compelled to buy at great expense other and inferior fuel for use in their business of brick making, and that by reason of the use of such inferior fuel a large quantity of brick were spoiled.

When the case was called for trial, the court, on defendant's motion, dismissed the case as to each of these several causes of action. The ground upon which the motion was made and granted is not stated, but it doubtless was that none of them stated facts constituting a cause of action. In this the trial court was clearly right. The wrong alleged is the obstruction of the navigation of the river, which is a public nuisance. The right of plaintiffs to navigate the river is not a private, but a public, right which they are entitled to only in common with the whole public; and the facts alleged only show that the present consequential damages to them from being prevented from navigating the stream may be greater in degree, but not different in kind, from those suffered by other riparian owners or the rest of the public who may desire to use this highway. It is not alleged that these obstructions resulted in any trespass upon or actual invasion of the private property of the plaintiffs, or that they cut off all access to it, but, taking the allegations of the complaint at their full value, they simply show that defendant has committed a public nuisance by obstructing a public highway which deprives the plaintiffs of the cheapest and most convenient route by which to convey their wood from their wood lot to their brickyard. The case, therefore, clearly comes within the familiar rule that an individual cannot maintain a private action for a public nuisance by reason of an injury which he suffers in common with the public; that it is only when he sustains special injury differing in kind, and not merely in degree or extent, from that sustained by the general public, that an individual may recover damages in a private suit. We think the case is fully covered by the following, among other, decisions of this court: Shaubert v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 21 Minn. 502; Rochette v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33 Minn. 201; Barnum v. Minnesota Transfer R. Co. 33 Minn. 385; Shero v. Carey, 35 Minn. 423.

The principle and its reason are thus stated by Lord Coke: "For if the way be a common way, if any man be disturbed to go that way, or if a ditch be made overthwart the way so as he cannot go, yet shall he not have an action upon his case; and this the law provided for avoiding of multiplicity of suits; for if any one man might have an action, all men might have the like." 1 Co. Inst. 56a.

While universally recognizing this principle, the courts have not always been clear or consistent in its application, sometimes seeming to confound for special damage some special circumstances in the situation of the individual by reason of which he has suffered from the obstruction of the highway damages greater in extent, but the same in kind, as those sustained by the general public. We think the correct rule to be that to constitute special damage there must be an invasion or violation

Sandf. 1; Gold v. Philadelphia, 115 Pa. 184, 6 Cent. Rep. 567; Meehling v. Kittanning Bridge Co. 1 Grant, Cas. (Pa.) 418; Abbott v. Mills, 8 Vt. 523; Baxter v. Winooski Turnp. Co. 22 Vt. 114; Hatch v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. 28 Vt. 142; United States v. New Bedford Bridge Co. 1 Wood. & M. 431; Talbott v. King, 82 W. Va. 6.

Case by a private individual for a public nuisance does not lie where plaintiff has suffered no particular direct damage or pecuniary actual loss. McLauchlin v. Charlotte & S. C. R. Co. 5 Rich. L. 533; Carey v. Brooks, 1 Hill, L. (S. C.) 365.

No individual can maintain an action for damages for a public nuisance, unless he has sustained an injury which is special in its character, or which is not common to others affected by the nuisance. Dougherty v. Bunting, 1 Sandf. 1; Butler v. Kent, 19 Johns. 223; Mills v. Hall, 9 Wend. 315; Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 500; Carhart v. Auburn Gas 7 L. R. A

Light Co. 22 Barb. 297; Osborne v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 5 Blatchf. 306; Currier v. West Side E. P. R. Co. 6 Blatchf. 437; Seeley v. Bishop, 19 Conn. 123.

Yet if anyone sustains a special injury by an act which is unlawful on the ground of public injury, he may maintain an action for his own special injury. Myers v. Malcolm, 6 Hill, 292; Henly v. Lyme, 5 Bing. 91; Lyme Regis v. Henley, 3 Barn. & Ad. 77, 1 Bing. N. C. 222; Pieroe v. Dart, 7 Cow. 600; Lansing v. Smith, 8 Cow. 143, 4 Wend. 25; Mills v. Hall and Carhart v. Auburn Gas Light Co. supra; Burrows v. Pixley, 1 Root, 332.

Any—the least—injury to an individual, by a public nuisance, e. g., an expense of time or money or labor, etc., entitles him to an action. Pieroe v. Dart, 7 Cow. 600; Hughes v. Heiser, 1 Binn. 463; Ross v. Miles, 4 Maule & S. 101; Lansing v. Smith, supra.

of using a public highway in common with the rest of the public. What we apprehend Lord Coke means by the reason assigned for the rule is that a mere public right to the use of a highway which an individual has only as a member of the public, and in common with them, must be asserted and maintained by the public as such, instead of permitting each individual to maintain a private action to abate the public nuisance, or for damages for an invasion of a mere public right; and such a rule, we think, is sustained by considerations both of principle and public policy. Our conclusion is that the court was right in dismissing the case as to these causes of action. The eleventh might clearly have been dismissed, upon the ground that the damages were remote, and not proximate.

2. Upon the fifth, sixth and seventh causes of action, the plaintiffs submitted their evidence, and when they rested the court dismissed them also on the ground that plaintiffs had failed to make out a cause of action, which ruling is assigned as error.

It is unnecessary to consider the questions discussed by counsel as to the extent and nature of the powers of the defendant under its charter, for we have been unable to discover anything in the evidence introduced or offered which, under the narrowest possible view of these charter powers, tends to connect the injuries complained of with any illegal or negligent act of defendant, or to show that they were the result (proximate at least) of any such act. Take, for example, the fifth cause of action; as to one matter all that the evidence offered would tend to prove is that there was a jam of logs against the piers of Anoka bridge, and that, in passing through, plaintiffs' wood raft struck a "sweeper" that projected from the jam, and was broken up. But the defendant did not build and maintain the bridge piers, and, assuming the logs belonged to defendant (which was not proven), it does not appear what caused the jam. There is not a particle of evidence that it was caused by any negligence of the defendant, or that it was derelict in its duty in efforts to break it. Without any reference to the defendant's charter, the courts will take judicial notice that floating logs is a legitimate use of this public stream, if exercised in a proper manner, and that for obstructions resulting from such use by unavoidable accident, the log owner would no more be liable than the owner of a steamboat which might accidentally sink while lawfully navigating the river. Take, again, the seventh cause of action, which was for damages caused by logs and debris cast against or upon plaintiffs' shore. There was not a particle of evidence offered that defendant's booms or piers caused this, or that it was caused by any negligence or fault of defendant in driving or handling its logs.

pered. It was perhaps intended to bring this cause of action within the doctrine of Weaver v. Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co., 28 Minn. 534, and McKensie v. Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co., 20 Minn. 298; but an examination of those cases will show how far short of them, on the facts, this case falls.

In another instance, a raft was caught between the shore and some logs set loose by the Otsego ferryman,—an act for which defendant was in no way responsible, unless, forsooth, it had no right to use the river at all for floating logs. In another case a raft of sheer booms of the defendant came down the river, and destroyed a raft of wood, but no offer was made to prove how this occurred, or that it was caused by any negligence or misconduct of the defendant. For anything that appears, it might have been an unavoidable accident, or one of the perils of navigation.

The same general criticism will apply to the evidence offered to support the sixth cause of action, which we think might also have been dismissed on the complaint, as not stating a case of special damage for which a private action would lie. In fact plaintiffs throughout the case seem to have proceeded on the theory that they had a right to the navigation of the river, absolutely free and clear of all logs. But such a conception of their rights was fundamentally erroneous. Floating logs is as legitimate a use of the stream as floating wood rafts or running steamboats; and as two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time, the use of the river for one purpose is necessarily, in a certain sense, an obstruction to its use for another purpose, and each person must, in his use of it, submit to such inconveniences as necessarily or naturally result from the proper exercise of the same right by others. The only instance we can find where there was an attempt to connect, even indirectly, plaintiffs' loss with what might have been an unlawful act of defendant, was where, what plaintiffs call the regular channel of the river being obstructed, they ran their wood raft down another course and struck a sandbar. In view of what occurred on the trial in connection with the offer of this evidence, we must assume the fact to be that plaintiffs, with previous knowledge that this channel was wholly obstructed, started out with their raft to run it down another way, and there met with this accident. On this state of facts there was no natural or proximate connection between the injury and the act of defendant in obstructing the channel. It would be analogous to a case where a man, knowing that one road was obstructed, started out on his journey by another, and perhaps poorer, road, and there met with an accident.

Order affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Jonathan EVANS, Appt.,
v.
ADAMS EXPRESS CO.

(....Ind....)

1. To stand in the carriage-way of a public street at night, engaged in conversation, heedless of horses and vehicles that are passing, is such negligence as will prevent recovery for injuries resulting from being thrown down by a wagon the driver of which did not see the person injured, although the driver, also, was negligent.

2. Where the united and contemporaneous negligence of two persons causes a collision between them in a public street, neither can recover from the other for a resulting injury.

(February 27, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Gibson County in favor of defendant in an action to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from a collision between plaintiff and a vehicle in charge of defendant's servant and alleged to have been caused by such servant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

NOTE—Contributory negligence defeats recovery of damages for personal injuries.

A person cannot recover for injuries caused by the negligence of others to which his own negligence has contributed. Allen v. Maine Cent. R. Co. (Me.) 19 Atl. Rep. 108.

Any negligence of the plaintiff, however slight, that contributed to the injury, precludes his recovery. Schoenfeld v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 74 Wis. 433; Moore v. Central R. Co. 24 N. J. L. 263; Runyon v. Central R. Co. 26 N. J. L. 556; Drake v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 441; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Matthews, 38 N. J. L. 531; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Toffey, 38 N. J. L. 526; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hull (Tenn.) 12 S. W. Rep. 419.

One unnecessarily standing in a place known by him to be dangerous is guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery. Schoenfeld v. Milwaukee City R. Co. supra.

Where a traveler on a highway voluntarily, and not of necessity, attempts to cross over a skid placed across the sidewalk in front of a store for the purpose of unloading a wagon, there being room to pass around it, and is injured, he is negligent. Jochim v. Robinson, 72 Wis. 199.

Contributory negligence as a defense.

Contributory negligence which will defeat a recovery consists in such acts or omissions on the part of the plaintiff, amounting to a want of ordinary care, as, concurring or co-operating with the negligent acts of the defendant, are a proximate cause or occasion of the injury. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Picklesimer, 13 Va. L. J. 646.

It is a good defense to an action for damages for a personal injury; and it is immaterial to what extent it is proven, provided it contributed to the injury. Kyne v. Wilmington & N. R. Co. (Del.) 13 Cent. Rep. 391; Gerity v. Haley, 29 W. Va. 98.

Freedom from negligence is not one of the essentials of the defense of contributory negligence. 7 L. R. A.

Mr. Lucius C. Embree, for appellant:
Negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which does not contribute proximately to the injury, will not bar his action if the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury.

Where the negligence of plaintiff contributed to his injury, caused by a defect in highways, there can be no recovery, unless the defendant, if aware of the plaintiff's danger, and having the opportunity to avert it, fails to use ordinary caution to do so. Phillips v. Ritchie Co. Ct. 31 W. Va. 477.

One who has by his own negligence contributed to an injury, cannot recover, though the negligence of the other party was gross. Atkyn v. Wabash R. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 193.

Where the plaintiff could have avoided the consequences of defendant's negligence, he is expressly prohibited from recovering under the Georgia Code. Smith v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. (Ga.) 10 S. E. Rep. 111.

Mitchell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Kvans sued the Adams Express Company to recover damages for injuries alleged to have resulted to him from being run over in a public street in the City of Princeton by a horse and wagon alleged to have been negligently driven by the agent or employé of the Company. There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant below. There is no controversy as to the facts. The evidence shows that about 7 o'clock on the evening of November 12, 1886, the appellant was standing on a crosswalk in a public street of the City of Princeton conversing with two acquaintances. After being thus engaged for a few moments, they stepped aside from the crosswalk, and continued in the street talking. The appellant stood in the street about eight feet from the curb, near the margin of the traveled track, over which horses and vehicles were accustomed to pass, there being, however, about thirty feet of space in the street, over which a horse and wagon might have been driven without coming in contact with the appellant. It was after night-fall, but it was not so dark but that persons standing or a horse and vehicle approaching on the street could be seen.

The Adams Express Company employed an agent at Princeton, who transacted its business for a stipulated price per month, and furnished his own horse and wagon, and employed a driver at his own expense, to carry express packages and mail to and from the trains. The United States mail was also carried to and from the trains in the same wagon, and when not occupied in carrying express or mail matter, the horse and wagon were employed by the owner, as opportunity offered for hire. On the evening in question the boy having the horse and wagon in charge received a sack of mail at the postoffice, and while on his way with it received at another place a parcel which was to go by express. With the mail-sack and express package in his wagon, the boy was pursuing his way to the depot, another boy occupying the driver's seat with him, the horse being permitted to walk at a moderate pace, without being guided. When within about twelve feet of the place where the appellant and his friends were standing, the boy observed them; and seeing two of them move out of the way, and being playfully engaged with the other boy, he did not afterwards see the appellant until the wagon wheel struck and threw him to the ground, inflicting painful injuries upon his person. The jury having found, in answer to a special interrogatory, that the appellant was not in the exercise of ordinary care at the time he was injured, it is proper to remark that no question is made on this appeal relating to the liability of the Express Company for the negligence of the driver employed by the owner of the horse and wagon. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Farver, 111 Ind. 195, 9 West. Rep. 621.

At the proper time the plaintiff asked the court to give the jury the following, among other instructions: "(12) The fact that at the time of the alleged injury the plaintiff was in the street, and not on the sidewalk or regular crossing for footmen, will not of itself preclude him from recovering, if you find that he was injured, as alleged, by the negligence of the driver of the vehicle in running it against and over him. An individual on the street of a city, whether he be on a sidewalk, a foot-crossing or on a carriage-way of such street, is bound to use only ordinary care to avoid injury, and whether such care has been used depends upon all the facts and circumstances surrounding the event."

This instruction relates to the subject of contributory negligence, and, while we regard it as in some respects defective, we do not deem it necessary to point out wherein it is inaccurate; since, even if it had been entirely correct, it would not have been error to refuse it, because the court had sufficiently expounded the law to the jury covering the subject of contributory negligence. We may remark, however, that it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that standing in the carriage-way of a public street in a city, in the dark, and engaging in conversation, without using sufficient vigilance to discover a slowly approaching horse and vehicle, may not preclude the recovery of damages for injuries resulting from the inattention of the driver. The degree of vigilance must always be in proportion to the danger which is reasonably to be apprehended from the situation in which one voluntarily places himself, and if a footman selects the carriage-way of a public street as a place at which to hold converse with his friends after night-fall, he may know that the situation and occasion are such as to demand more than ordinary vigilance to avoid contact with vehicles in the charge of inattentive drivers, who are not looking out to avoid footmen standing in the way.

The following instruction given by the court is complained of: "(15) Where one knows of danger which threatens injury to himself, or where one voluntarily places himself in a dangerous place, as in a public street where horses and vehicles pass, and he can avoid such danger by reasonable exertion, his negligent failure to do so will prevent his recovery for an injury so incurred."

We are unable to discover any just ground of objection to the above instruction, and the 7 L. R. A.

same may be said of the one which follows, in which the court told the jury that: "(18) To stand in a public street, knowing that it is where wagons and horses are liable to pass, and especially to stand in such a place at night, and to pay no heed to the danger of so standing, and take no care to avoid the danger of such a place, is not exercising reasonable care to protect one's self from the danger of such a place."

It is said that the instruction is erroneous, because it assumes that a public street, where horses and wagons are liable to pass, is a dangerous place. The assumption contained in the instruction is that it is dangerous to stand heedlessly in such a place, especially at night. This is so, according to the common observation and experience of mankind, and we are unable to see how the jury could have been misled by being so instructed.

When the facts assumed present a case in which the standard of duty is fixed and certain, or when the measure of duty as defined by law is the same under all circumstances, to omit the duty is negligence, and may be so declared by the court; or when, upon a given hypothesis, negligence is so clearly defined and palpable as to constitute negligence under all circumstances, it is the duty of the court to declare that, if the facts assumed are found from the evidence, the conclusion of negligence follows as a matter of law. It is for the court to say whether or not, upon a given state of facts, negligence may or can reasonably be inferred. The jurors have to say whether or not the facts assumed have been proven, and whether, when they are submitted to them by the court, negligence ought to be inferred. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Locke, 112 Ind. 404-421, 11 West. Rep. 877, and cases cited; Carter v. Carter, 97 Ind. 497; Woolery v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 107 Ind. 381, 5 West. Rep. 667; 2 Thomp. Neg. 1236.

For a footman to stand heedlessly at night in the carriage-way, on a public street, where it is known that horses and vehicles are liable to pass momentarily, is so unusual that persons riding or driving along the street might well be thrown off their guard, and for one to do so without taking any precaution to avoid danger from persons riding or driving on the street is negligence. In effect, this is what the court told the jury. It is true that a footman about to cross a street is not held to the degree of diligence that is imposed upon a traveler at the crossing of a street by a railroad track. Stringer v. Frost, 116 Ind. 477, 2 L. R. A. 614.

It is, however, the duty of persons crossing or about to cross a public street on foot, to look and take proper precautions so as to avoid collision with approaching horsemen or vehicles. We quite agree that, if the driver of the express wagon saw the appellant standing in the street, it was his duty to turn out, and not drive his wagon upon him; and if the facts presented a case in which it appeared that the driver, after seeing the appellant, had any reasonable ground to apprehend that he was not aware of the approaching wagon, and was unconscious of the danger that was imminent, a recovery would have been justified, notwithstanding the antecedent negligence of the appellant. Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v.

Long, 112 Ind. 166, 11 West. Rep. 822; Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Pitzer, 109 Ind. 179, 4 West. Rep. 250, and 7 West. Rep. 896; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 61.

One whose negligence has contributed to an accident from which he has sustained an injury will not be debarred the right to recover if the defendant, after having discovered his peril, having also reasonable ground to believe him unconscious of danger, or unable to avoid it, might himself, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, have prevented the mischief which followed. The ground upon which a plaintiff may recover, notwithstanding his own negligence, is that the defendant, after becoming aware of the danger to which the plaintiff was exposed, failed to use a proper degree of care to avoid injuring him. Zimmerman v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 71 Mo. 476.

Such a case is not, however, presented by anything contained either in the instructions or the facts which appear in the record.

Where the negligence of two persons is contemporaneous, and the fault of each operates directly to cause the injury, the rule deducible from the authorities is that the plaintiff cannot recover if, by the exercise of ordinary care on his part, he might have avoided the injurious results of the defendant's negligence. Bigelow, Torts, 811; Mayhew v. Burns, 108 Ind. 328, 1 West. Rep. 577; Murphy v. Deane, 101 Mass. 455.

When a collision occurs in a public street by the united and contemporaneous negligence of two persons, neither can recover from the other for a resulting injury.

The facts and instructions bring the case clearly within the rule last above stated. What has already been said disposes of all the questions made, and demonstrates that no error was committed by the court which would justify a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

CITY OF INDIANAPOLIS et al.

1. Section 2, Act of March 9, 1889, requiring publication of a notice of the passage of a municipal resolution declaring the necessity for certain improvements, which shall state the time and place where property owners may make objections to the necessity for the construction thereof, does not contemplate the appointment of a committee to hear the objections or the determination of the rights of the objectors, such determination being provided for in another section; hence such notice is not rendered invalid by the facts that objections are required to be filed with the city clerk, and that no committee is appointed to hear them.

2. The validity of the issuance by a municipal corporation of bonds or certificates to raise funds to construct a street improvement, which show on their face the purpose for which they are issued, and that they are payable out of a special fund to be derived from assessments upon the property bordering on the street improved, and for the payment of which out of the general funds of the corporation no liability exists, is not affected by the constitutional provisions limiting the indebtedness of such corporations.

3. Where by the Act authorizing a municipal corporation to construct street improvements the portion of the expense thereof chargeable to it is to be paid in cash upon the completion of the work, no indebtedness can be said to be incurred therefor, even although during the pendency of the work bonds may be issued to raise funds to prosecute the same.

4. One who has signed an agreement provided for in an Act authorizing street improvements, that in consideration of the right to pay his assessment in installments, he will not question its validity, cannot attack the provision of the Act prohibiting the questioning of the assessment by one in such position.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendants in an action to enjoin the issuance of certain bonds and the enforcement of a certain street assessment against plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

Messrs. Denny & Elliott for appellant.
Mr. W. L. Taylor, City Atty., for appellees.

Mitchell, Oa. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is shown by the complaint, upon which all the questions in the present case arise, that the plaintiff, Thomas F. Quill, is a resident taxpayer of the City of Indianapolis, and the owner of a certain described lot in one of the additions to the City. It appears that the common council and board of aldermen, in August, 1889, assuming to proceed under the authority of the Act of March 9, 1889, entitled "An Act Concerning Powers and Duties of Cities and Incorporated Towns, . . . Providing the Mode and Manner of Making Street Improvements and Building Sewers . . . and Permitting Cities and Incorporated Towns to Issue Street and Sewer Improvement Bonds," passed an ordinance for the improvement of a certain designated street in the City on which a lot owned by the plaintiff abutted.

The contract for the improvement was duly awarded to Robert Kennington, who completed the work accordingly, after which the city engineer made and reported his final estimate of the total cost of the improvement, and apportioned the amount to the several lots and parcels of land bordering on the street, as required by § 817, Elliott's Supp., being section 6 of the above Act. The report having been presumably adopted, and an assessment made by the proper authorities after due notice, it is averred that the contractor threatened to enforce payment of the amount assessed against the plaintiff's lot, and, being unable to pay, it is alleged that the plaintiff, in order to prevent the sacrifice of his property, executed, under protest, a written agreement in which he stipulated, in effect, that in consideration of having the right to pay the amount assessed against his lot in installments, he would make no objection to the legality or regularity of his assessment, etc.

It is also averred that in making the improvement the City incurred a debt of $97 for that portion thereof occupied by street and alley crossings, which it is alleged is in violation of the Constitution of the State, and that the corporation is about to issue bonds, as provided in the Act mentioned, to cover the cost of the improvement.

After setting out the amount or value of the taxable property within the City and the present indebtedness, it is averred that the indebtedness already exceeds 2 per centum of the value of all the taxable property.

It is also averred that while the property owners were duly notified, as provided in section 2 of the Act, of the time and place where they might make objection to the necessity of the improvement, that no committee was appointed to hear the objections, which, according to the direction of the common council, were required to be filed with the city clerk. It is contended that the giving of such a notice was not a compliance with the provisions of the Act, because no committee was appointed to hear and determine the validity of the objections. It is also contended that the City has no power to issue the bonds provided for in the Act, because its present indebtedness exceeds the limit fixed by article 13 of the Constitution of the State, and that so far as the Act assumes to authorize the issuing of bonds without regard to the amount of the existing indebtedness it is unconstitutional.

Section 818, Elliott's Supp., requires the common council, whenever it deems it necessary to make any of the improvements authorized by the Act, to declare the necessity therefor by resolution, and also to state the kind, size, location and terminal points thereof. Ten days' notice of the passage of the resolution is required to be given by two weeks' publication in some newspaper of general circulation; and it is also required that the notice thus published shall state the time and place where the property owners along the line of the proposed improvement can make objections to the necessity for the construction thereof. This Statute contemplates the publication of notice for two successive weeks, ten days prior to the day fixed for making objections; that is, the first publication must have been made twenty-four days before the time therein fixed. The Statute does not require or contemplate the appointment of a committee to hear the objections, or that there should be any determination of the rights of the objectors. It simply contemplates that no action shall be taken by the common council, after resolving to make the improvement, until notice is given and an opportunity afforded the property owners to present for the consideration of the council such objections as they may make to the necessity for the construction of the work.

It is designed to prevent the city authorities from entering inconsiderately upon the construction of expensive improvements, without affording the property owners, who are in the end to pay for them, the opportunity to present their objections at the outset, which are intended to be rather as advisory to the common council than otherwise. This purpose could be accomplished as well by requiring objections to be filed with the clerk to be by him laid before the common council, as in any other way. The right of the property owners to appear before the common council for the purpose of urging the validity of any objections filed with the clerk is in no way abridged or impaired. The right to a hearing is secured to each property owner by another provision of the Act. We discover no valid objection to the notice.

It is conceded that the present bonded indebtedness of the City exceeds the limit fixed by the Constitution, but it is contended that the cost of improving the street and alley crossings payable by the City must and will be paid in cash, and that the bonds authorized by the Act in question are merely improvement bonds, for the payment of which the City is not liable, and that they are hence not an indebtedness of the City within the contemplation of the Constitution.

So much of article 13 of the State Constitution as is germane to the subject under examination declares: "No political or municipal corporation in this State shall ever become indebted, in any manner or for any purpose, to an amount in the aggregate exceeding 2 per centum on the value of the taxable property within such corporation, to be ascertained by the last assessment for state and county taxes previous to the incurring of such indebtedness, and all bonds or obligations in excess of such amount given by such corporation shall be void."

It becomes necessary to determine whether bonds or certificates issued in pursuance of the provisions of the Act above mentioned create an indebtedness within the inhibition of section 13. It is essential, therefore, that we consider the Act and ascertain its scope, purpose and effect. An examination of the Statute discloses at once that the entire cost and expense of constructing any work or improvement provided for therein, for the payment of which bonds or certificates may be issued, is to fall primarily and exclusively upon the property benefited, except only for such part of the work as shall be occupied by street and alley crossings, the expense of which the corporation is to pay. Provision is made whereby, during the progress of the work, estimates may be made from time to time of the amount of work done by the contractor, and the amount of the estimates, less a reasonable percentage to secure the completion of the contract, may be paid out of the corporate treasury; but the amount of such estimates is made a lien upon the several parcels of ground upon which they are assessed in favor of the municipality and the owner of the certificates or bonds which may afterwards be issued. Elliott's Supp. § 816.

Of course the money thus advanced by the City does not constitute a debt against the City. It is simply money advanced by the City to be repaid by the property owners.

The Statute provides that when the work is completed a final estimate of the total cost thereof is to be made, and distributed according to a rule prescribed, against each lot or parcel of ground bordering on the street or alley improved. This is to be reported to the common council of the City. Notice to and a hearing by each person feeling himself aggrieved is provided for, and after the report, with such alterations or amendments as may be made, is adopted, the common council is required to assess against the several lots or parcels of ground the several amounts which should be assessed on account of the improvement. The amounts so assessed become a lien upon the several lots or parcels of ground, and are to be placed on the city tax duplicate and charged against the several lots and become payable in 10 per cent installments to be collected as other taxes are collected, with 6 per cent interest to be collected from the date of the final estimate, payable semi-annually. It is provided that the proceeds arising from the assessments so made, when collected, shall constitute a special fund for the payment of the costs of the improvement, and the bonds and certificates thereafter provided for. Provision is made for the issuance of bonds by the City for the purpose of raising money with which to pay for the improvement, or bonds or certificates may be issued to the contractor in payment for the work; but in either case it is required that the bonds shall bear the name of the street or alley improved or sewer constructed, and that they shall be payable out of the special fund provided for in the Act.

Without summarizing further, it is enough to say the remedy of the holders of the bonds or certificates is confined exclusively to the special fund provided for, and to the collection of assessments by enforcing the lien upon the lots or parcels of ground assessed with the cost of the improvement. The City is in no way liable for the payment of the bonds except out of the special fund to be accumulated from assessments made against the property benefited. According to the scheme promulgated in the Statute, in case the assessments are paid without delinquency, it is impossible for a single bond or certificate to mature in advance of the accumulation of a special fund devoted exclusively to its payment. If the assessments become delinquent, the remedy of the holders of the bonds or certificates is confined to the property. There is no liability against the City. The special fund provided for and the property are the sources from which the holders of the bonds and certificates must receive their pay, the city authorities acting merely as an agency for making and collecting the assessments, and as the custodian of the fund when the assessments are collected. In this they do not act as the agents of the City, but as special agents to accomplish a public end. Montgomery Co. Comrs. v. Fullen, 111 Ind. 410, 9 West. Rep. 651.

A fair interpretation of the Statute requires that the character of the bonds and the fact that they are payable out of a special street-improvement fund shall appear upon the face of the paper, thus making it apparent to the world that they are not to be regarded as the obligations of the corporation. While the common council and officers of the City are designated as the instruments to be used in executing the scheme devised, it is apparent all the way through that the entire expense of constructing an improvement for which bonds may be issued is to be borne exclusively by the property benefited.

for the payment of a debt when it comes into existence, a contract to supply water to a city, under which debts against the city may arise from time to time, covering a period in the future, was not within the inhibition of the Statute. These cases are more than sufficient to vindicate our conclusion that any bonds which can be issued under the law in question are not affected by the constitutional inhibition.

As respects the expense for so much of street and alley improvements as shall be occupied by the street and alley crossings, it is fairly apparent from the whole scope and tenor of the law that the corporation becomes liable to pay that in cash, upon the completion and final estimate of the work, or as estimates therefor may be made from time to time. This being so, no debt results on that account.

It is said, however, that so much of section 819 as provides that "no suit shall lie to restrain or enjoin the collection of such assessments," and that the validity of such assessment shall not be questioned, is unconstitutional because it is an attempt to deprive the land owner of all substantial remedy for the protection of his property, thereby in effect depriving him of his property without due process of law. While we are satisfied that it would be within the power of the Legislature to enact that one who had stood by while an improvement was being made, under color of statutory authority, until the work was substantially completed, and until his property had received the benefit of the money expended, should not thereafter question the validity of the assessment, we are not required to go to that extent in the present case. Freisinger v. Harness, 114 Ind. 491, 18 West. Rep. 846; Ross v. Stackhouse, supra.

It is apparent from the connection in which it occurs that the above provision only applies to those persons who, in consideration of their right to pay their assessments in semi-annual installments, agree in writing, to be filed with the city clerk, that they will not make any objection to the legality or regularity of their respective assessments. Such an agreement is required by section 821, as the condition upon which the property owner may secure the benefit of the installment scheme for which the Act provides. When the work is completed the property owner has his election to refuse to sign the agreement provided for and stand upon his common-law rights in respect to contesting the validity of the assessments made against him, in which case the assessment becomes due whenever made, or he may waive any irregularities and secure the benefit of ten years' time by signing an agreement to that effect. Since, as we have seen, the law makes no provision whereby the bonds go out with any credit from the municipality issuing them, this feature of the law puts the securities or bonds beyond question, by giving them the absolute credit of the property upon which they are made a lien of the same degree as taxes are a lien, and removing all question as to the validity of the assessments.

While, as we have said, we do not doubt the power of the Legislature to incorporate into the Statute the feature complained of, even without the agreement, for it is little else than the affirmation of a common-law principle, there is no 7 L. R. A.

room to question its validity as applied to one who has signed the agreement provided for.

What has been said disposes of all the questions argued or involved in the record, and, as we find no ground for reversing the ruling of the learned court from which the appeal is prosecuted, the judgment is affirmed, with costs.

Petition for rehearing overruled June 6, 1890.

Board of Commissioners of KNOX COUNTY, Appt.,

William H. JOHNSON.

1. The rule that mandamus will lie to compel a board of commissioners to approve the bond of a public officer or show cause for not approving it does not apply where the rejection of the bond operates as a decision against the right of the applicant to hold the office, since such decision is a judicial one from which an appeal will lie.
2. The failure of a school superintendent who has been elected and duly inducted into office to give, within the proper time, the special bond required by the Act of March 2, 1890, will not per se forfeit his title to the office.
3. Where an officer is rightfully in office and there is a fair question, as there was under the Act of March 2, 1890, as to whether the time within which he is directed to file a special bond in order to be entitled to continue in office begins to run from the date of his election or upon the happening of a future event, and he files the bond within the time designated after such event happens, a declaration that he has vacated the office, made without a hearing by a board which has no general power to appoint such officers, does not oust him therefrom.
4. One who has been duly elected and inducted into an office, and who institutes proceedings to determine his right to continue therein after an attempt has been made to oust him therefrom for failure to file a special bond, need not prove himself eligible to the office.

Under this section, a failure to give bond within ten days after the commencement of the term of office, and the receipt of the certificate of election, vacates the office.

Baker v. Wanbaugh, 99 Ind. 812; State v. Johnson, 100 Ind. 489.

Messrs. W. F. Townsend and George G. Reilly for appellee.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 3d day of June, 1889, the appellee was elected county superintendent of the public schools of Knox County for the term of two years, and on the 14th day of that month he duly qualified. On the 20th day of June, 1889, the Board of Commissioners declared the office vacant because of the failure of the appellee to file the special bond required by section 16 of the Act of March 2, 1889. Elliott's Supp. § 1293.

The Board on the same day appointed William H. Pennington to the office which it had declared vacant, but he did not accept the appointment. On the 12th day of August, 1889, the appellee presented the bond required by the Statute to which we have referred, but the Board refused to accept it. The appellee continued to discharge the duties of the office, but his claim for compensation was rejected. In September, 1889, the Board of Commissioners appointed Thomas Crosson to the office, and he accepted and qualified. The appellee appealed from the decision of the Board to the circuit court, and judgment was there rendered in his favor. In the circuit court the appellant unsuccessfully moved to dismiss the appeal.

It is held by some of the courts that the refusal to accept the bond of a public officer is a ministerial act, and that approval may be coerced by mandamus. 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 446.

But there are many strongly reasoned cases which hold that the duty is a judicial and not a ministerial one. State v. Dunnington, 12 Md. 840; Ex parte Harris, 52 Ala. 87, 23 Am. Rep. 559; Thomason v. The Justices, 3 Humph. 233; Swann v. Gray, 44 Miss. 393; Bay County v. Brock, 44 Mich. 45.

In the case of Gulick v. New, 14 Ind. 93, it was held that mandamus will lie to compel a county clerk to approve the bond of a sheriff. The decision in that case may be sustained upon the ground that the clerk was a ministerial officer, and that no appeal could be taken from his action in refusing to approve the bond.

The contention of ure of the appellee days after his elect that the office was v ion refusing to app lee's position upon tion of the bond within thirty days after the governor issued his proclamation protected his title to the office.

As our statement of facts shows, the appellee was elected after the Act of March 2, 1889, went into force, and the question is whether he lost his title to the office by his failure to give the special bond within thirty days after his election. If he did lose his title to the office, then he is in no situation to complain, for if he is not entitled to the office he has no cause of action. The section of the Statute which governs the case reads thus:

"It shall be the duty of the several county school superintendents of this State, within thirty days from the issuing of the proclamation by the governor, as hereinbefore provided for, and of every county school superintendent hereafter elected, before he enters upon the discharge of his official duties, to enter into a special bond, with at least two freehold sureties of such county, payable to the State of Indiana, conditioned that they will faithfully and honestly perform all the duties required of them by this Act, and account for and pay over all moneys that may come into their hands pursuant to the provisions of this Act, in a penal sum which shall be equal in amount to $100 for every one thousand inhabitants of their respective counties, as shown by the last census immediately preceding the giving of such bond, to be approved by the board of commissioners of their respective counties; and upon the failure of any county school superintendent to give such bond, his office shall become immediately vacant, and the board of commissioners of his county shall immediately appoint such competent and suitable person to fill such vacancy for the unexpired term of his office."

We cannot agree with the appellee's counsel that the Statute does not apply to superintendents elected after the law went into force, but who had given the general bond at the time of their election. We see no reason for attempting to change the words used in the Statute, and they clearly direct that superintendents elected after its passage shall file a special bond within thirty days after their election. It is only those who were elected prior to the time the Statute took effect that are allowed thirty days after the governor issues his proclamation to file a special bond.

But it by no means results from the construction we have given the Statute that the appellee lost his title to the office to which he was elected and to which he had been legally inducted. It is held by our own and other courts that statutes requiring official bonds to be filed within a designated time are directory and not mandatory. Upon this question the authorities are harmonious. State v. Porter, 7 Ind. 204; Smith v. Cronkhite, 8 Ind. 184; Indianapolis v. Geisel, 19 Ind. 844; Indianapolis v. Wright, 19 Ind. 846; Speaks v. United States, 18 U. S. 9 Cranch, 28 [8 L. ed. 645]; People v. Holley, 12 Wend. 481; State v. Churchill, 41 Mo. 41; State v. Texas Co. Ct. 44 Mo. 280; Sproul v. Lawrence, 33 Ala. 674; State v. Ely, 43 Ala. 568; Kearney v. Andrews, 10 N. J. Eq. 70; State v. Falconer, 44 Ala. 696.

This rule is carried very far, for it is held, without substantial diversity of opinion, that unless the Statute makes the filing of a bond within a limited time a condition precedent to the right to the office, the failure to file it within the time prescribed will not work a forfeiture of the right to the office nor create a vacancy.

In the case of Chicago v. Gage, 95 Ill. 593, 85 Am. Rep. 182, the Statute provided that upon failure to file a bond within the time designated, the person chosen shall "be deemed to have refused said office, and the same may be filled by appointment," and it was held not to change the rule.

In State v. Toomer, 7 Rich. L. 216, the provision of the Statute was, that upon the failure of the person elected to file a bond within the time limited, "the office shall be deemed absolutely vacant, and shall be filled by election or appointment," and the court adjudged upon full consideration that title to the office was not lost. But we cannot further quote from the adjudged cases, and we cite them without comment. State v. Colvig, 15 Or. 57; State v. Peck, 30 La. Ann. 290; State v. Ring, 29 Minn. 78.

Under the established rule, the mere failure of the appellee to give the additional and special bond required by the Act of 1889 did not, it is clear, forfeit his title to the office, for his case is much stronger than those to which we have referred. That the case of the appellee is an unusually strong one is apparent when it is brought to mind that he was actually and rightfully in office, having duly qualified as the law directs. As he was rightfully in office and had duly qualified, his failure to execute the special bond cannot by any possibility be considered as a failure to perform a condition precedent to his right to the office. The utmost that can be said is that it was his duty, if he desired to continue in office, to file the special bond required by the Act of 1889.

If the appellee had lost title to the office it must be for the reason that before he filed the special bond the Board of Commissioners had declared the office vacant. In order to determine the effect of this declaration it is necessary to consider the facts and give some attention to the provisions of the Act. The proclamation of the governor was not issued until more than thirty days after the election of the appellee, and until the proclamation was issued no duty could be required of the superintendent which made the bond necessary. There is, indeed, reason for the contention of the appellee's counsel that no superintendent, whether elected before or after the passage of the Act, was bound to give the special bond until the governor's proclamation was issued, for, until that was done, there was no necessity for a bond. Section 6 of the Act provides that as soon as the contract for the furnishing of books shall be entered into, the governor shall issue his proclamation announcing such fact to the people of the State. While we feel compelled to yield to the explicit provisions of section 10, and to hold that the direction contained in it applies to all superintendents elected after the passage of the Act, we must also hold that there is a substantial and close question involved, for there is no little reason for holding that until the governor issued his proclamation the school superinten-a question, too, upon which not only laymen, but lawyers, might, in the utmost good faith, entertain opposite views.

The question comes to this: Can a person rightfully in office be ousted for the failure to give an additional and special bond within the time prescribed, in a case where there is a substantial and close legal question as to when the time begins to run, without a day in court and a hearing?

It is to be remembered that the Board of Commissioners has no power to elect a county superintendent, nor any general power to appoint, so that the question is very different from one arising in a case where the removal is made by the appointing power. The power to oust an officer rightfully in office is essentially a judicial one, except where it is exercised by the appointing power. State v. Harrison, 118 Ind. 434, 18 West. Rep. 370; Page v. Hardin, 8 B. Mon. 673; Dullam v. Wilson, 53 Mich. 100.

If it is judicial, then it seems clear that the officer is entitled to a hearing.

In Williams v. Bagot, 3 Barn. & C. 786, Bagley, J., said: "It is contrary to common justice that a party should be concluded unheard."

The question was fully considered in the case of Reg. v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 1 El. & El. 545, and it was held that there could not be a removal without a hearing. This decision was made upon a statute providing that a curate whose license was revoked might "appeal to the archbishop of the province, who shall confirm or annul such revocation, as shall seem to him proper." Lord Campbell said: "No doubt the archbishop acted most conscientiously and with a sincere desire to promote the interests of the Church but we all think he has taken an erroneous view of the law. He was bound to hear the appellant and he has not heard him. It is one of the first principles of justice that no man shall be condemned without being heard."

Delivering an opinion in a case involving the right to remove an officer, Chief Justice Marshall said: "It is a principle of natural justice, which courts are never at liberty to dispense with unless under the mandate of positive law, that no person shall be condemned unheard or without an opportunity of being heard." McCade v. Deputy Marshal of Va. Dist. 1 Brock. 324.

In the case of Com. v. Stifer, 25 Pa. 23, the doctrine was carried very far, perhaps too far, for it was held that although the governor had the power to appoint, still he could not remove an officer without giving him an opportunity to be heard.

In the case of Biggs v. McBride, 17 Or. 640, the question arose in a case where the governor, acting under a statute, removed a railroad commissioner who held his office by virtue of a legislative enactment, and the court, in discussing the question whether the power to remove was executive or judicial, said: "But it is believed, under either view, and by whomsoever the removal for cause may be exercised, it must be done upon notice to the delinquent." 7 L. R. A.

See also 7 L. R. A. 435.

Many other cases affirm the same general doctrine. State v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 93, 3 West. Rep. 125; People v. New York Fire Comrs. 73 N. Y. 448; People v. New York, 19 Hun, 441; State v. St. Louis, 90 Mo. 19, 6 West. Rep. 464; Willard's App. 4 R. I. 601; Field v. Com. 82 Pa. 482; Foster v. Kansas, 113 U. S. 201 [28 L. ed. 629]; Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 480 [28 L. ed. 478].

In the two cases last cited, the Supreme Court of the United States assumed jurisdiction, without hesitation or question, of cases involving the right to remove state officers and examined the statutes and proceedings so far as to ascertain whether there was due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment, thus tacitly deciding that without a hearing an officer cannot be removed.

Our conclusion is that where, as here, an officer is rightfully in office, and there is a fair question as to whether the time within which he is directed to file a special bond in order to entitle him to continue in office begins to run from the date of his election or upon the happening of a future event, and he does file a bond within the time designated after such event does happen, a declaration that he has vacated the office, made without a hearing, does not oust him. We are far within the authorities in asserting this conclusion, but the case does not require that a broader or more general one should be asserted.

As the appellee had been duly elected and inducted into office, and as the only question that was presented by his failure to file the additional bond required by the Act of 1890 was as to his right to continue in office, it was not necessary for him to show that he was eligible to the office. There is a radical difference between such a case as this and one wherein the plaintiff asserts a right to be admitted to an office.

PENNSYLVANIA CO., Appt.,

Nicholas MARIEN.

(.....Ind.....)

1. Railway companies are bound to keep the platforms at their passenger stations.

NOTE.—Common carriers of passengers; obligations and liabilities.

A common carrier may constitute itself such by advertising or general acceptance of employment. Citizens Street R. Co. v. Twiname, 10 West. Rep. 524, 111 Ind. 537.

A person transporting passengers for hire upon a railroad operated by him is a common carrier. Davis v. Button, 73 Cal. 247.

The obligations and liabilities of a common carrier do not depend upon contract. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Swift, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 232 (20 L. ed. 423); Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 55 U. S. 14 How. 436 (14 L. ed. 502).

Common carriers of passengers are obliged to tions in a safe condition for persons to enter and leave the cars; and failure to do so will render the company liable to persons injured, without fault on their part, on account of the defect.

3. Whether or not alighting from a moving train constitutes negligence is a question of fact to be determined by the jury, taking into consideration all the circumstances connected therewith.
3. Permitting a witness to answer a question as to what he did on a certain occasion, over an objection that it calls for a conclusion or opinion, is not reversible error where the court subsequently strikes out of the answer all that portion which states a conclusion or opinion.
4. Excluding evidence is not reversible error where the excluded evidence is subsequently admitted.
5. A physician will not be permitted to testify regarding answers to inquiries propounded to an injured person whom he had been called to visit professionally, concerning matters in which he had no interest or concern professionally, or which were made for the purpose of qualifying himself as a witness, at least where they in any way relate to the injury or to the patient's former condition.
6. A witness cannot be impeached by a bill of exceptions containing his testimony taken at a former trial of the same action.
7. A passenger is not bound to abandon the use of a station platform, which is not in good repair, and seek some other way of entering and leaving the cars, if it is still held out by the company as safe, and used by the public.
8. The fact that a person may have seen a station platform out of repair at one time does not bind him to carry such defect in mind upon all future occasions when approaching or leaving a train at such place.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Owen County in favor of plaintiff, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel O. Pickens, for appellant:

Generally negligence is a question of mixed law and fact, but where there is no controversy about the facts, what is proper care becomes a question of law for the court. And where all the facts found do not constitute negligence the court will so declare and will not hesitate to set aside a verdict.

And so, whether there has been contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is generally a question for the jury. But where the facts are undisputed or where but one reasonable inference can be drawn from them the question is one of law for the court.

Duty of railroad carrier to give opportunity to passenger to alight.

It is the reciprocal duty of a railroad company and a passenger, the former to give reasonable time to leave the train at the place of destination, and the latter to use reasonable diligence and care in getting off. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lyons, 129 Pa. 113.

A passenger who, in getting off a train at a stopping-place where there was no platform, stepped down, not on the side where passengers usually alight, but on the other side, where there was another track and was injured by a passing train which he could not have failed to see had he used his eyes; and where his only reason for getting down on that side was that it was a more level surface and an easier place to get down,—cannot recover. *L. cover for injuries received. Morgan v. Camden & A. R. Co. (Pa.) 23 W. N. C. 189.

A railroad company, whose servants move a train before a passenger thereon who is entitled to leave at the stopping place has had a reasonable time to alight, and while he is in the act of leaving the train, thereby gives him an implied invitation to alight while it is moving; a compliance by him therewith is not per se negligence, unless speed or some other circumstance makes it manifestly dangerous. Louisville & N. B. Co. v. Stacker, 86 Tenn. 343.

A passenger told by the conductor that he would let him off at a certain station to take a train in the other direction, when hurriedly told by the conductor, "Be quick and get off," without any warning that he is not at the station mentioned, is not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to reach a moving train only seven or eight feet distant, although it is on a dark night, and he has no light except a dim lantern, and falls into an uncovered waterway between the tracks. Griffith v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 96 Mo. 163.

A passenger who, upon alighting from a train upon a dark night, and when no sufficient light is furnished by the company, commits himself to the guidance of a third person, thereby waives the duty of the company to furnish him with safe means of departure. Wallace v. Wilmington & N. R. Co. (Del.) 18 Atl. Rep. 813.

A railroad company owes the same duty, in respect to allowing a reasonable time to leave the train, to one who goes upon it to aid a passenger who is in an enfeebled condition requiring assistance to alight, that it owes to a passenger, although the services were voluntary. *Louisville & N. Messrs. J. C. Robinson and Inman H. Fowler for appellee.

Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the appellee against the appellant, to recover damages sustained by the appellee, alleged to have resulted by reason of the negligence of the appellant.

On the 6th day of December, 1882, the appellee was a passenger in a caboose of one of the appellant's freight trains from Gosport to Mundy's Station. When the train arrived at the latter station, the place of appellee's destination, and while the train was slowing up to make the stop and running at a very slow rate of speed, the appellee stepped off the car on the platform, the train not coming to a stop until after the caboose passed the platform. In stepping on to the platform the appellee fell, with his right arm under the car, and it was so badly crushed by the car wheels passing over it that it had to be amputated.

The appellant is charged with negligence in constructing and maintaining the platform in an unsafe and dangerous condition, wholly unfit and unsafe for use of passengers.

The appellant demurred to the complaint for want of facts, which was overruled and exceptions. Issue was joined by answer in denial, and a trial had resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for $3,000. Appellant filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled and exceptions.

The rulings of the court on the demurrer to the complaint and motion for new trial are assigned as error. There was a former trial of the cause and an appeal to this court and reversal of the judgment. Pennsylvania Co. v. Marion, 104 Ind. 289, 2 West. Rep. 284.

It is conceded by counsel for appellant that the complaint is sufficient, and the alleged error in overruling the demurrer to the complaint is waived. The only error relied upon for the reversal of the judgment is the ruling of the court on the motion for new trial. The principal grounds urged against such ruling is that the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence. This contention of the appellant is mainly on account of the fact that the evidence shows that the appellee stepped from the train while it was in motion, and this it is contended is negligence per se, and therefore it must be declared as a matter of law that the appellee was guilty of contributory negligence, and hence cannot recover.

It is important to consider what obligation rests upon the appellant in regard to the keeping of the platform at the station in repair, and this has been so fully considered in the recent decisions of this court that it is unnecessary to do more than refer to the decisions and quote briefly from them.

In Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Lucas, 119 Ind. 583, at p. 590, it is said: "The duty of a railway carrier does not end when it provides safe cars, engines and appliances, for its duty extends so far as to require it to provide means for passengers to safely enter its cars at its stations, and that duty also requires the carrier to make it safe for them to leave its cars and stations."

It is further said: "It was the duty of the appellant to keep the platform which it used in conjunction with the Pennsylvania Company in a safe condition. The situation of the platform and the manner of its construction were such as to make it the duty of the appellant to see that it was safe, for it was bound to know that if it became unsafe the lives and limbs of its passengers were put in peril."

In the case of Lucas v. Pennsylvania Co., 120 Ind. 208, the following language from Bishop on Non-Contract Law, § 1086, is quoted and approved: "The depot and connected grounds, visited by coming and going passengers, should be fitted up with a careful regard to their comfort and safety. The approaches, the tracks around the platforms and places for entering and leaving the cars, every spot likely to be visited by passengers seeking the depot, waiting at it for trains or departing, should be made safe and kept so, and at reasonable times should be lighted; and passengers not in fault, injured through a neglect of this duty, may have compensation."

These decisions settle the law in this State in accordance with the holding of other courts, that railway companies are bound to keep the platforms at their passenger stations in a safe condition for persons to enter and leave the cars; and a failure to do so is a neglect of duty which makes the company liable to persons injured without fault on their part on account of such defective platform.

The evidence clearly shows the platform where the appellee stepped from the car to be out of repair, and unfit and unsafe for use by passengers in getting on and off trains; and this is not seriously controverted, except to contend that it might have been worse.

We next consider the question of contributory negligence by the appellee in stepping from the train while in motion. There was evidence from which the jury may have found that at the time the appellee stepped from the train the train was moving at a speed of not over two miles an hour, or at the speed of an ordinary or slow walk of a person, and that it came to a stop about two car-lengths beyond the platform; that it was moving at that slow rate of speed, and was continuing to move past the platform and the appellee came out upon the platform of the car and stepped on to the lower step and from there on to the platform at the station in a careful manner, and as he stepped on to the platform his feet slipped or he stumbled and fell by reason of the condition of the platform; that the platform was uneven, some boards being higher than others, the boards warped and the platform sunken in the center so that it was on a decline from the outer edge next to the track toward the center, and

There was no evidence from which the jury may have properly found that appellee was unacquainted with the condition of the platform, and the appellee was a man in full vigor and strength and the place of alighting was on the platform of a public railway station, used to enter and depart from the cars run on appellant's railroad. Under this state of the evidence the question as to whether or not the appellee was guilty of contributory negligence was a fact to be left to the jury to determine.

The question as to whether or not a person who voluntarily alights from a moving train is guilty of negligence or not was considered in the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Crunk, 119 Ind. 543, and in that case it was held that whether alighting from a moving train constitutes negligence or not is a fact to be determined by the jury trying the cause, taking into consideration all the circumstances in connection with the alighting; and this we think well supported by authorities which are considered and cited in that case.

There was evidence to support the verdict.

Some other causes for new trial are stated in the motion, and while they are not waived, as we understand counsel in their brief, they are not confidently relied upon for a reversal. The first in order is, appellee was asked by his counsel the following question: "In stepping off the train what effort, if any, did you make to prevent yourself from falling?" Appellant objected on the ground that the question called upon the witness to give a conclusion or opinion. The objection was overruled and the witness made the following answer: "Well, I don't know. I had a hold with my left hand and I stepped off careful, as careful as I could, and my feet kind of flew from under me and how I did fall, I can't exactly tell you how it did happen."

Appellant then moved to strike out from the evidence the words: "I stepped off careful, as careful as I could," and the court sustained the motion. The question called for the witness to state what he did, and not a conclusion or opinion, and the court struck out all that portion of the answer stating a conclusion or opinion of the witness.

The next error complained of is the sustaining an objection to cross-examining questions propounded by appellant to appellee while a witness, in regard to whether or not he had drunk intoxicating liquor at Gosport. The appellee had not been examined in chief as to what he did or where he was while at Gosport; but there is no available error in this ruling, as afterwards the appellee was called and the appellant's counsel fully cross-examined him upon the same subject, interrogating him as to what he drank at Gosport.

The appellant called one Dr. Schill as a witness. The doctor had assisted in dressing the appellee's injuries, and while engaged in such professional duties he conversed with appellee, and the doctor was interrogated on the subject and it was proposed to prove by him that he asked the appellee how the accident occurred, and appellee should have answered that the Company was not to blame for the accident; that he tried to get off the train before it stopped the doctor while engaged professionally in treating the appellee for the injury. It is contended by appellant that this question was propounded, not to ascertain the nature of the injury, but to learn whether the appellee was to blame for the injury. In this ruling there was no error.

The case of Houston v. Simpson, 115 Ind. 69, 14 West. Rep. 899, and other decisions collected and cited in that opinion are decisive of this question. The physician had no business to interrogate his patient for any purpose or object other than to ascertain the nature and extent of the injury, and to gain such other information as was necessary to enable him to properly treat the injury and accomplish the object for which he was called professionally, and such communications are privileged and he cannot disclose them. If the physician took advantage of the fact of being called professionally, and while there in that capacity made inquiries of the injured party concerning matters in which he had no interest or concern professionally, or for the purpose of qualifying himself as a witness, he cannot be permitted to disclose the information received. The patient puts himself in the hands of his physician; he is not supposed to know what questions it is necessary to answer to put the physician in possession of such information as will enable the physician to properly treat his disease or injury; and it will be conclusively presumed that the physician will only interrogate his patient on such occasion as to such matters and facts as will enable him to properly and intelligently discharge his professional duty, and the patient may answer all questions propounded which in any way relate to the subject or to his former condition, with the assurance that such answers and communications are confidential and cannot be disclosed without his consent.

One Parish was called and testified as a witness for the appellee, and the appellant offered in evidence that portion of the bill of exceptions taken in the former trial of this cause, containing the testimony given by the witness on the former trial for the purpose of contradicting or impeaching the witness, and it was objected to and the court sustained the objection and the appellant contends such ruling was error. This ruling was proper.

It is contended that the court erred in giving and refusing to give certain instructions. One question presented by the exceptions to the instructions relates to the appellee leaving the train while in motion, it being contended by the counsel for appellant that in so doing the appellee was guilty of contributory negligence which barred his right to recover, and the appellant requested an instruction on this theory and the court refused to give it and gave an instruction submitting the question to the jury to determine whether, under all the circumstances, the appellee was guilty of contributory negligence in leaving the train at the time, place and manner he did.

The instructions given by the court are in accordance with the rules as hereinbefore stated in passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence. The instructions given state the law fairly on the subject, and the court properly refused those requested by the appellant.

It is further contended that the instructions given by the court in relation to the duty of the appellant in keeping its platform in repair, and as to appellee's knowledge of the condition of the platform at the time of the injury, are erroneous, and instructions numbers two and four are particularly complained of in this respect. We do not deem it necessary to set out these instructions, as they must be considered and construed together with all the other instructions in the case relating to the same matter, and when the instructions are considered and construed together they state the law to be that a railroad company, in constructing a platform for the use of passengers in getting on and off trains at a public railway station, intrusts its use to the public, and impliedly represents and gives out to the public that it is reasonably safe and sufficient for such purpose, and it is their duty to make it so as that it may be used safely in approaching and leaving trains, in any way in which passengers might reasonably and with reasonable care be expected to approach and leave trains; and that if the one at Mundy's, where appellee alighted, was not so constructed or was allowed to become and remain out of repair so that it could not be used only by careful attention to its structure, and if inattention as to its actual condition would imperil the safety of passengers, it would be insufficient, and the Railroad Company would be guilty of negligence in knowingly suffering and allowing it to remain in such condition, and that although the appellee may have previously known of its condition he would not be bound to keep such knowledge actually in mind; and if, at the time he stepped from the train upon it he knew of its condition, yet he would not be required to abandon the use of it and seek some other place of approaching and leaving the train, and if he used care proportionate to the known danger, and was injured by reason of such defect, he would not be barred from recovery; and that it was for the jury to determine, from all the facts and circumstances, whether or not the appellee was guilty of negligence in leaving the train at the time, place and manner in which he left it; if he was guilty of negligence in so leaving the train, which contributed to the injury, he could not recover.

We think there was no error in these instructions. Certainly under the authorities we have heretofore cited, the duty of the appellant in regard to the keeping of its platforms in repair is not too strongly stated against the appellant.

Railway companies are common carriers; they owe a duty to the public, and the public has the right to rely upon its performance. The fact that a person may have seen a platform out of repair at one time does not bind him to carry such defect in mind upon all future occasions, when approaching or leaving a train at such point. The platform is in constant use by the employees of the Company. They are bound to take notice of its condition. The presumption is, not that such defect will be allowed to remain, but that the Company will discharge its duty to the public and repair the defect. If the defect were such as would naturally suggest to one of common understanding that it was dangerous, and place one in peril to pass over it to and from a train, and with such knowledge one voluntarily steps upon it, or, having knowledge of such defect, within such a short space of time previous that the Company could not reasonably be expected to have repaired it, under such circumstances one may be regarded as not having used ordinary care, and having recklessly entered upon it at his own risk; but we have no such case as this under consideration. The Railroad Company stand in the position of saying to the public, "Our platform is safe," and though it is not in such repair as the Company are required to keep it, yet it is in common use by the public, and being so held out by the Company and used by the public, the appellee was not bound to abandon its use and seek some other way of entering and leaving the cars. If in using it as he is invited to do by the Company he exercises proper care proportioned to the apparent condition of the platform in leaving the train, and is injured by reason of the defects, we do not think it can be said that he is guilty of contributory negligence and cannot recover for the injury sustained by reason of the negligence of the Company.

We have a long line of decisions of this court which support our conclusion, which hold that, when there is a defect in a street, a person is not bound to abandon the use of the street; that he may travel upon the street provided that it be not such a defect as renders the street impassable or would suggest to one of common understanding that to attempt to pass it would put one in peril. And if, in the use of the street, he exercises care proportioned to the known danger, he may reasonably expect to shun or avoid the defect; and if in doing so he is injured, he can recover.

These cases are collected and cited in the cases of Gosport v. Evans, 112 Ind. 133, 11 West. Rep. 115; Brannen v. Kokomo, G. & J. Gravel Road Co. 115 Ind. 115, 14 West. Rep. 887, and Knightstown v. Musgrove, 116 Ind. 121.

This disposes of all the questions presented. We think there is no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed, at costs of appellant.

Petition for rehearing overruled June 4, 1890.

A husband has no rights as tenant by curtesy in lands in which his wife had an estate in remainder where she died before the expiration of the life tenancy, and never had a right to the reversion.

(Pardee and Carpenter, JJ., dissent.)

(October 30, 1883.)

ON reservation upon demurrer to the answer from the Superior Court for New Haven County, for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Errors, of an action brought to recover possession of a dwelling house and lot from one claiming it as tenant by the curtesy. Judgment for plaintiffs advised.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William E. Townsend and George D. Watrous, for plaintiffs, in support of the demurrer:

By the common law of England, and by the decisions of every State in which the question has arisen, there can be no curtesy in a reversion or remainder, expectant upon a prior estate for life, unless the life estate ends during the coverture.

NOTE.—Tenancy by the curtesy of wife's estate.

Tenancy by the curtesy is an estate for life created by the act of law. When a wife is seized at any time during coverture of an estate of inheritance, in severalty, in coparcenary, or in common, and hath issue by her born alive, and which might by possibility inherit the same estate as her heir, and she dies in the lifetime of her husband, he holds the estate during his life. 4 Kent, Com. 27; Litt. 34 35, 36; Co. Four things are requisite to an estate by the curtesy, viz.: marriage, actual seisin by the wife, issue and death of the wife. The husband's estate is initiated on issue had, and becomes consummate on the death of the wife. 3 Kent, Com. 28.

If the wife has an equitable estate of inheritance, notwithstanding the rents and profits are to be paid to her separate use during coverture, the husband is tenant by curtesy, and so where she has a seisin in equity as a cestui que trust. *Cochran v. In neither Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 208, nor Kline v. Beebe, 6 Conn. 494, relied on by defendant, was there any question raised as to the right to curtesy in a reversion or remainder.

This "ownership," which is sufficient in this State to give curtesy plainly connotes a right of immediate possession, or, as Washburn says, when commenting on this case, a "right of entry."

The right is not affected by the Enabling Act, in relation to married women, passed in New York State in 1848, or the amendments thereto in 1849. Zimmerman v. Schoenfeldt, 3 Hun. 407.

The effect of § 4034, Married Dig., and Const. 1874, upon the rights of husband and wife in her real estate, was to exclude his marital rights during her life and to secure to her the right to use and dispose of it at will; but if she makes no disposal of it, and there be issue of the marriage, born alive, the title by curtesy consummate attaches at her death as at common law. *Neely v. She was "seised" of this estate—constructively by the common law of England, actually by the common law of Connecticut.

Ownership, vested title, present right of property, has always meant "seisin" with us—this ownership being publicly shown by the record title.

Hillhouse v. Chester, 3 Day, 166. And see 1 Swift, System of Com. Laws, 313; Bryan v. Bradley, 16 Conn. 480.

Where the distinction between actual and constructive seisin has been maintained, Mrs. Oviatt would be regarded as seised in law, though not in deed.

Stoddard v. Gibbs, 1 Sumn. 268.

In Connecticut the ancient rule seisina facit stipitem was never a part of the common law.

In Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 298, it was held, as the logical necessity of Hillhouse v. Chester, that seisin of the wife, in the sense of the ancient common law of England, was not necessary to constitute a tenancy by the curtesy, in Connecticut, and that ownership, or present right of property, that is, seisin in the sense of Connecticut common law, was sufficient.

See also Kline v. Beebe, 6 Conn. 494.

Seisin now means ownership.

Anderson, Law Dict. Seisin (1889); and see Jenkins v. Fahey, 78 N. Y. 855; Vanderheyden v. Orandall, 2 Denio, 21.

We have never had common-law dower in Connecticut. Nor has actual seisin ever been property free from the disposal, control or interference of her husband, does not destroy his estate by the curtesy in her separate property after her decease. Ibid.

Seisin during coverture essential; rule at common law.

The wife, according to English law, must have been seised in fact and in deed, and not merely in law, of an estate of inheritance, to entitle the husband to his estate by curtesy. Co. Litt. 29 a; 4 Kent, Com. 29; Cruise, Dig. chap. 2, § 12, 16; Taylor v. Gould, 10 Barb. 388; Barr v. Galloway, 1 McLean, 476; Gibbs v. Esty, 23 Hun, 266.

The husband cannot have curtesy where his wife was never seised of the estate. Bogy v. Roberts, 48 Ark. 17.

At common law, either the wife, or the husband, in right of his wife, must have had a seisin in deed, which is actual possession of the land. Nixon v. Williams, 95 N. C. 103.

Where the wife of the plaintiff, now dead, was entitled to the land in dispute as heir-at-law, and her husband rented it as tenant of the ancestor's widow, but the wife lived on the land, it was held that she had such seisin as entitled her husband to an estate by the curtesy. Ibid.

Qualification of the rule.

A qualification of the rule relative to seisin in fact by the wife has been rendered necessary in this country, and under the ownership of waste, uncultivated lands, she is deemed seised in fact thereof, so as to entitle her husband to his right of curtesy. Pond v. Bergh, 10 Paige, 140; Jackson v. Sellick, 8 Johns. 262; Green v. Liter, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 249 (8 L. ed. 550); Smoot v. Lecatt, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 590; McCorry v. King, 3 Humph. 276.

The common-law rule requiring actual possession as a condition precedent to curtesy does not apply to such lands owing to circumstances and the changed conditions which obtain in this country. Mettler v. Miller, 129 Ill. 630.

But a right of possession in the wife during coverture is in general necessary to support a tenancy by the curtesy. Ferguson v. Tweedy, 48 N. Y. 548.

It is sufficient for the claim of curtesy that the wife had title to the land, though she was not actually seised. Sterling v. Penlington, 7 Viner, Abr. 149, pl. 11.

Entry on land.

In general there must be an entry on the land of the wife by the husband to enable him to claim as tenant by the curtesy. Mercer v. Selden, 42 U. S. 1 How. 37 (11 L. ed. 33).

But an actual entry pedis possessio during coverture is not necessary to create the tenancy. Buckley v. Buckley, 11 Barb. 48, 65.

Executors, by paying taxes and selling a portion of the estate in coal, which is reserved from the sale of the surface of the ground, but who are not in the actual occupancy or possession of the property, and have no interest except a power of sale, are in no such possession as to prevent a claim of curtesy by her husband after her death. Rankin's App. (Pa.) 2 L. R. A. 429.

Where a husband bringing ejectment for his curtesy dies, his administrator may be substituted, and recover mesne profits to the time of such death. Hart v. McGrew (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 312.

By reason of husband's curtesy initiate a married woman during coverture has no right of action to recover possession of her fee-simple lands from a stranger, that right being in her husband; and after her death her heirs have no right of action until her husband's death; and hence the Statute of Limitations does not commence to run against them until after the death of her husband. Valle v. Ober- required in Connecticut dower. "Legal title" is alone sufficient.

1 Swift, Dig. *85.

Loomis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this action demands the possession of a certain house and lot in the City of New Haven. The answer of the defendant, which was demurred to by the plaintiffs, sets forth the facts that control the case.

Elam Hull of New Haven died in 1868, leaving a valid will, which gave to his widow, Nancy Hull, the real estate described in the complaint, during her natural life, with remainder to his daughter, Louisa Oviatt, then wife of the defendant, Henry N. Oviatt, and to her heirs forever. Mrs. Oviatt, the devisee of the remainder, died in 1861 before her mother, having had two children of her marriage with the defendant, who are the plaintiffs in this action and her heirs-at-law. Mrs. Hull, the devisee of the life estate in the demanded premises, died in 1869.

The gist of the answer is, that the defendant, as surviving husband of Mrs. Oviatt, is entitled to the possession of the premises in question as tenant by the curtesy; and the point of the demurrer is that, as Mrs. Oviatt died before the expiration of the life tenancy of her mother, she never had even a right to the possession, and consequently there was no legal seisin in the wife to furnish one of the indispensable requisites of title by the curtesy in the surviving husband.

The sole question for discussion as presented by the pleadings is, May a husband be tenant by the curtesy in lands of which his wife had only a remainder, expectant on a prior estate which did not determine during coverture?

The four requisites to make a tenant by the curtesy, as stated in Blackstone's Commentaries, and in all the treatises on the common law that include this subject, are marriage, seisin of the wife, birth of issue capable of inheriting and the death of the wife. No one of these requisites up to the present time has ever been dispensed with by the courts of England or the United States, unless pursuant to some statutory enactment.

Some disparity, however, exists in the definition or application given by different courts to the word "seisin." Blackstone (vol. 2, p. 127), after stating the requisites as above, adds: "The seisin of the wife must be an actual seisin or possession of the lands; not a bare right to possess, which is a seisin in law, but an actual possession, which is a seisin in deed." This is still the general rule; but certain exceptions have been recognized and adopted by several courts. The possession of a lessee under a lease for years reserving rent is regarded as an actual seisin in the wife as reversioner, so as to entitle the husband to an estate as tenant by the curtesy, although he never received or demanded rent during the life of the wife. Ellsworth v. Cook, 8 Paige, 646; De Grey v. Richardson, 3 Atk. 469; Watts v. Ball, 1 P. Wms. 108.

Wild uncultivated lands may be constructively in the wife's possession unless in the ad-house, 68 Mo. 81, overruled, Dyer v. Wittler, 4 West. Rep. 673, 80 Mo. 81.

For notwithstanding the sweeping language of the first section of the Act, no person is embraced in or contemplated by that or any other section of the Statute, except such as have a present existing right to commence an action or make an entry. Dyer v. Brannock, 66 Mo. 423; Johns v. Fenton, 4 West. Rep. 64, 88 Mo. 64; Harris v. Ross, 86 Mo. 80; Kelly v. Hurt, 74 Mo. 563; Adams, Eq. 227; Wood, Lim. 584.

Can be no seisin of a vested remainder, or in a life estate.

There can be no seisin in deed or in law of a vested remainder limited upon a precedent freehold estate; so where a daughter, a feme covert, dies in her mother's lifetime her husband is not entitled to curtesy, in the third assigned as dower, even after termination of the widow's life estate. Re Cregier, 1 Barb. Ch. 598; Green v. Putnam, 1 Barb. 506; Taylor v. Gould, 10 Barb. 401; Ferguson v. Tweedy, 43 N. Y. 549.

There cannot be an estate by the curtesy in a life estate. Phillips v. Laforce, 4 West. Rep. 683, 80 Mo. 72.

An estate settled on a feme covert for life, with a power of appointment at her death in fee, does not give her such an estate as will entitle the husband to curtesy if she fails to appoint. Graves v. Trueblood, 26 N. C. 495.

Where the fee of a testatrix's estate is devised to a trustee, and a life estate in part carried out for her surviving husband, with remainder in fee vested in the trustee, the devisee of the life estate takes no more than that carved out for him, and he may elect as to his claim in virtue of his marital right. Wright v. Jones, 2 West. Rep. 360, 105 Ind. 37; Langley v. Mayhew, 3 West. Rep. 726, 107 Ind. 198, 7 L. R. A.

Where a woman entitled to a remainder subject to a life estate dies before the life tenant, her husband takes no estate by curtesy. Webster v. Ellsworth, 147 Mass. 602.

The husband of a mortgagee in fee has no curtesy, unless the equity of redemption has been barred by time. Chaplin v. Chaplin, 3 P. Wms. 234; 7 Viner, Abr. 156, pl. 22; 4 Kent, Com. 32.

A separate estate created by the husband to or for his wife, whether directly or through a trustee, presumptively excludes the husband from tenancy by the curtesy. Dugger v. Dugger, 84 Va. 130.

A deed to a married woman, "to her sole and separate use and free from the interference of her husband," etc., defeats the right to curtesy in the premises on the grantee's death. Haight v. Hall, 3 L. R. A. 887, 74 Wis. 152. See also McCulloch v. Valentine, 24 Neb. 215.

The wilful desertion of a wife by a husband for a year or more immediately preceding her death deprives him of his right of curtesy, under the Pennsylvania Act of May 4, 1855. Bealor v. Hahn, 9 Cent. Rep. 599, 117 Pa. 169.

A deed by a husband and wife may convey the interest of the husband as a tenant by the curtesy, although ineffective to convey the wife's interest because of a defective acknowledgment by her. Mettler v. Miller, 129 Ill. 620.

But an estate by curtesy is not barred by a deed of land to a daughter "and to her heirs and assigns, exclusively of her husband." Rank v. Rank, 1: Cent. Rep. 424, 120 Pa. 191.

Though a wife may lose her dower by her act of adultery, no such forfeiture of his curtesy attaches to the adulterous act of the husband. Buckworth v. Thirkell, 3 Bos. & P. 652, note; Co. Litt. 241 a, But verse possession of another. Pierce v. Wanett, 10 Ired. L. 446; Davis v. Mason, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 507 (7 L. ed. 240); Clay v. White, 1 Munf. 162.

Recovery in ejectment has been held equivalent to actual entry. And where the wife takes under a deed actual entry is not necessary. Jackson v. Johnson, 5 Cow. 74, 97; Adair v. Lott, 8 Hill, 182, 186.

And in the States of Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Mississippi and Tennessee, a right of entry on the part of the wife would be a sufficient seisin, although the premises were in the adverse possession of another. Stoolfoos v. Jenkins, 8 Serg. & R. 175; Borland v. Marshall, 2 Ohio St. 308; Redus v. Hayden, 43 Miss. 624; Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 298; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 8d ed. top p. 160.

But this is substantially the extent of the modifications of the common-law idea of seisin of the wife as applicable to the husband's right to an estate by the curtesy. And there is on the other hand a remarkable consensus of judicial opinion in the courts of England and the United States, and among all the text-writers upon the subject, to the effect that if there be an outstanding estate for life the husband cannot be the tenant by the curtesy of the wife's estate in reversion or remainder unless the particular estate be ended during coverture. 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 489; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. top p. 175, § 33; Tyler, Infancy and Coverture, 2d ed. § 284; 4 Kent,

Com. 59; Moody v. King, 2 Bing. 447; Ferguson v. Tweedy, 43 N. Y. 548; Shores v. Carley, 3 Allen, 426; Brooks v. Everett, 18 Allen, 457; Fisk v. Eastman, 5 N. H. 240; Orford v. Benton, 36 N. H. 895; Hitner v. Ego, 23 Pa. 805; Watkins v. Thornton, 11 Ohio St. 387; Stoddard v. Gibbs, 1 Sumn. 268; Medley v. Medley, 27 Gratt. 568; Adams v. Logan, 6 T. B. The proposition established by such a weight of authority, being identical with the question in this case, ought to control, unless it is found to contravene some peculiar policy, system or precedent, already established in this State, or unless it is productive of injustice or great inconvenience.

And here the counsel for the defendant earnestly contend that the proposition is in direct contravention of our peculiar system and opposed to some early decisions of this court. They rightfully claim that credit is due the courts of this State for repudiating at an early day one of the fruits of the feudal system, which has come down to us preserved in the common-law maxim, "non jus sed seisinam facit stipitem;" it is not the right but seisin that makes the stock or root. But we cannot yield a like hearty assent to the claim that, because we have repudiated mere seisin as the stock of inheritance in distributing the estate of a de-

A conveyance in fee, by a tenant by the curtesy or a tenant for life, is not a forfeiture of his estate. M'Kee v. Pfout, 3 U. S. 8 Dall. 496 (1 L. ed. 690).

Estate once vested is liable for husband's debts.

Where the estate by the curtesy is once vested in the husband, it becomes liable for his debts, and cannot be divested by his disclaimer (Watson v. Watson, 13 Conn. 63), and may be sold by his creditors on execution at law. Canby v. Porter, 12 Ohio, 79.

A voluntary settlement of curtesy, when vested, upon his wife, is void as to his creditors. Vanduzer v. Vanduzer, 6 Paige, 366; Wiocks v. Clarke, 8 Paige, 161.

An estate of curtesy is liable to seizure and sale on execution against the husband. Gay v. Gay, 11 West. Rep. 608, 123 Ill. 221.

A husband's estate by curtesy is exempt, during coverture, from execution for his sole debt, under Mo. Rev. Stat., § 3246; and the purchaser cannot sue in ejectment therefor after his wife's death. Churchill v. Hudson, 84 Fed. Rep. 14.

An estate by the curtesy consummate exists in the wife's lands unaltered by her during her lifetime though devised by her will. It is subject to the liens of her husband's creditors in preference to the general liens of her creditors. Browne v. Bockover, 84 Va. 424.

Where levy was made upon property of a married woman, under an execution against her husband for debts contracted after the passage of an Act providing that her property should be as absolute as if she were unmarried, and not subject to his disposal or liable for his debts, it was held that he had no interest, as tenant by the curtesy, which could be the subject of a sale, but that the law had placed the wife, in regard to her property, in the condition of a feme sole. Hitz v. Nat. Metropolitan Bank, 111 U. S. 722 (28 L. ed. 577).

Disposal of estate by wife.

Where the wife by her will gave a pecuniary legacy to her husband, "which is to be in full settlement of all his demands upon my estate," and devised to others all of her real estate, she thereby did "provide otherwise by her will" than that her husband should have one half of her land for his life, in pursuance of the statute. Burke v. Colbert, 3 New Eng. Rep. 788, 144 Mass. 160.

A married woman may, with the written consent of her husband, by will make a disposition of his right as tenant by the curtesy which will be valid against his creditors as well as against himself, notwithstanding the inhibition of the statute. Rev. Stat. N. J. 638, § 9. See Steward v. Middleton (N. J.) 17 Atl. Rep. 294.

The husband's consent is not necessary to give validity to a will executed by the wife, or to affect its operation, except as it may deprive him of his right as tenant by the curtesy. Burke v. Colbert, 3 New Eng. Rep. 788, 144 Mass. 160.

The Pennsylvania Married Woman's Act of June 3, 1867 (Pub. Laws, 332), § 5, providing that a married woman may dispose of her property, real and personal, by last will and testament, in the same manner as if she were unmarried, does not enable the wife to deprive her husband of his right as tenant by curtesy. Re Teacle's Estate (Pa.) 25 W. N. C. 379.

The failure to renounce a provision for him in his wife's will does not bar his right to curtesy, but bars his right to a distributive share. Cunningham v. Cunningham, 30 W. Va. 569.

Where a husband conveyed to a trustee for the use of his wife, and the wife devised the land to her children, her husband is entitled to curtesy in the estate. Soltan v. Soltan, 12 West. Rep. 115, 98 Mo. 307.

ceased person among his heirs, a logical necessity must compel this court to cast upon a surviving husband a tenancy by the curtesy in lands which his wife could by no possibility have enjoyed during the existence of the marriage relation.

The position of the husband in relation to property belonging to his wife and to her children is very different from that between an intestate and his natural heirs in reference to the estate to be distributed. It does violence to the dictates of natural affection and our sense of justice to see a purely artificial and arbitrary rule erected between an intestate and the natural objects of his bounty. The very maxim that embodies the rule contains an implied confession that it is wrong, for the language is, "not right, but seisin." But, on the other hand, to adopt the language of Hosmer, Ch. J., in Heath v. White, 5 Conn. 285, "the system of tenure by the curtesy is at least pretty artificial, and is what it is because ita lex scripta est."

Its origin is not very well known, nor is there any principle to which by common consent it is referable. But the counsel for the defendant contend that the reason for requiring actual seisin in the wife is to be found in the fact that the common law confined inheritance to the stock of actual seisin. If it clearly appeared that this was the sole reason, the defendant would be entitled to the benefit of the rule "that when the reason of any particular law ceases, so does the law itself."

The citation from 2 Blackstone's Commentaries, 128, and from 1 Greenleaf's Cruise, title Curtsey, § 23, to the effect that the rule as to seisin in curtesy probably arose from the rule as to inheritance, at first impressed us as furnishing strong support for this position. But on turning to Williams' able treatise on Real Property, 4th edition, appendix E, *491-502, we found an exhaustive discussion of this question in which he conclusively shows by many citations from Coke, Littleton and Blackstone, as well as by other reasons, that this supposition is not true; and his conclusion is "that the reason why an actual seisin was required to entitle the husband to curtesy was that his wife may not suffer by his neglect to take possession of her lands, and in order to induce him to do so the law allowed him curtesy of all lands of which an actual seisin had been obtained, but refused him his curtesy out of such lands as he had taken no pains to obtain possession of."

In 2 Blackstone's Commentaries, *181, under the head of dower, it is said: "A seisin in law of the husband will be as effectual as a seisin in deed, in order to render the wife dowable; for it is not in the wife's power to bring the husband's title to an actual seisin, as it is in the husband's power to do with regard to the wife's lands; which is one reason why he shall not be tenant by the curtesy but of such lands whereof the wife, or he himself in her right, was actually seised in deed." Lord Coke also has a statement to the same effect.

Bishop, in his treatise on the "Law of Married Women," argues that curtesy does not depend solely on the right of issue to inherit, but upon the nature of the wife's estate as well—that it was one that might have been made to yield sustenance to the married parties during coverture. After an able review of all the leading authorities, he says (§ 499): "The result of this reasoning seems to be that, while the possibility of the issue inheriting is essential to curtesy, actual possession of the hereditaments by the wife is also essential, curtesy not arising except where the two concur. In this respect the analogy of curtesy to dower is complete. If we suppose that dower was given to assist the widow in her own maintenance and curtesy to assist the husband in maintaining the children, the analogy ought to be complete; and the law is not unreasonable in declining to give, after death, the use of what was not in use during life."

These considerations would seem to be ample to show that the abolition of the common-law maxim requiring seisin for the stock of inheritance does not logically determine the right of the husband to curtesy in a remainder which could not by possibility have vested in possession during coverture. And finally, the fact that nearly or quite all the States in this country, and England also, have abolished the maxim referred to, and now distribute the estates of intestates among the heirs without any reference or regard to the actual seisin of the ancestors, and yet at the same time hold firmly to the doctrine that either actual or legal seisin is an indispensable requisite to title by the curtesy, affords the strongest presumption against the correctness of the defendant's position.

But all this discussion will be in vain if the precise question under consideration has already been decided by this court in the way counsel for the defendant contend. Only two cases are relied upon in support of this contention—Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 298, and Kline v. Beebe, 6 Conn. 494.

In the first of these cases the facts, so far as they relate to curtesy, were as follows: Robert Woodhouse died actually seised of the premises in 1775. On his death they descended to Mary, his only child, who married James Goldear in 1794. She died in 1807, her husband surviving her, having had children who could have inherited the premises. Neither Goldear nor his wife ever had actual possession of them during coverture, but the defendant had been in possession adversely for more than twenty years. The question was whether Goldear was tenant by the curtesy. There is no doubt that the court, by a majority of its members, held that actual seisin was not necessary to make the husband tenant by the curtesy. But whether or not the court intended to hold constructive seisin or a seisin in law to be necessary is left in some doubt. There existed a right during coverture to recover the possession, so that the case was in fact one of constructive seisin. If we except a single passage at the close of the opinion of the majority of the court, given by Reeve, J., the reasoning is strictly confined to the precise case before the court, where there was a constructive possession. It is as follows: "We have always considered ownership of real property sufficient to maintain an action of trespass against every intruder; but by the English law actual possession by entry is necessary. We have always considered ownership as giving a right to possession of real property, as much so as ownership of personal property. Ownership in the one case draws after it possession as much as in the other case; and whenever a right of possession is lost, all title and ownership are lost. . . . The English law distinguishes betwixt a right of possession and a right of property; but our law does not. Wherever there is a right to real property, there is of course a right of possession." The concluding interrogatory—why seisin should be thought necessary to curtesy, since it had been dispensed with in cases of descent, may have been intended, notwithstanding its unlimited terms, merely to furnish an argument for dispensing with actual seisin only; otherwise it would seem impossible to explain why so much stress had been placed in all the previous reasoning on the right to take possession as the controlling fact.

But in the argument for the defendant our attention was repeatedly called to the word "ownership" as constituting seisin. The meaning, however, is explained, we think, in the same opinion, as involving not abstract title alone, but also the right of possession; and it is explained again in Chalker v. Chalker, 1 Conn. 87, 88. Trumbull, J., after citing a passage from the opinion in Bush v. Bradley, said the word "ownership" was there used in its strict legal sense, and added: "It is a mistake to suppose that our courts have arbitrarily disregarded the rules of the common law, for I hold that in this State we have adhered to them as strictly in all these points as has been done in England, and that every deviation is either directly enacted in express words or clearly deducible from the legal construction of our own statutes;" and it was held in that case that an actual entry was necessary to revest a freehold estate forfeited for breach of a condition in a deed.

In Shelton v. Alcox, 11 Conn. 249, Williams, Ch. J., in giving the opinion of the court, said: "When we say a man has the title to a farm, we mean he is the owner of it, and vice versa. And this corresponds with the legal meaning. He who has the possession, the right of possession and the right of property, has a perfect title."

In Kline v. Beebe, supra, the land in question had been devised to Deborah Bolles for life or during widowhood, with remainder to her daughter Patty, who married the plaintiff in 1795. Four years before her marriage, when she was only eighteen years of age, she deeded the property to the defendant's grantor. She arrived at full age more than a year before her marriage, and died in 1815, having had children by the plaintiff. Her mother Deborah also died during the same year, but whether it was before or after the death of Patty the record nowhere discloses. The question of curtesy was not brought up for review at all by the motion for a new trial, if we may judge by the brief and argument in support of the motion, for there is no hint or allusion to the question at all. Moreover the record expressly says: "The plaintiff had children by Patty, and was without question tenant by the curtesy of lands whereof she was seised during the coverture."

There was no discussion or reasoning by the court except upon the three points made as to the validity of the deed given by Patty when she was under age, in respect to which the court determined: (1) that the deed was not void by statute as she was not under the government of a parent or guardian; (2) that at common law the deed was not void but voidable only; and (3) that after the arrival of the grantor at full age it was ratified and affirmed. The only allusion to curtesy consisted of a preliminary remark by Hosmer, Ch. J., before he came to the questions for review, as follows: "The title of the plaintiff as tenant by the curtesy is not defective for want of actual seisin in his wife. A husband in this State may be tenant by the curtesy of lands, although his wife was not seised during the coverture. Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 293."

This at most merely affirms the former case, or, if it does any more, it clears up that decision by showing by implication that a seisin in law is the seisin required, the term "actual seisin" being almost invariably used in contradistinction to seisin in law. It is probable that the court made this statement because counsel for the defendant had said: "The plaintiff is not entitled to recover as tenant by the curtesy, his wife not having had possession in fact of the land during coverture. Further, as her deed was only voidable, and it was not avoided during her life, she had no ownership or right of possession during the coverture, within the principle of Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 293."

This claim strikes us as very significant, for it shows that the very eminent counsel who made the point understood that the principle of Bush v. Bradley was, that a right of possession made a sufficient seisin as distinguished from "possession in fact," and it is also implied that counsel believed the life estate of Deborah had determined during the coverture, for the only reason given why there was no right of possession in Patty was, that she had given a deed of all her rights which vested all her interest in the grantee, until at least the deed was avoided, which was never done. If the estate for life had not determined, counsel would surely, as it seems to us, have mentioned that fact, having their minds directed specifically to the point whether there was a right of possession during coverture. Counsel for defendant in the case at bar claimed that, in the dissenting opinion of Peters, J., a suggestion was made indicating that the mother survived Patty. The remark was: "The grantor was sui juris one year only before she died, during the existence of the particular estate and when she had no right of entry. But this manifestly refers to the year 1794-95, when she was of full age and before her marriage. Hosmer, Ch. J., in considering the question whether Patty had ever affirmed her deed, on page 505 states the same fact, that she "arrived at full age more than a year before her intermarriage with the plaintiff and about three years after the deed was executed."

It seems to us that this case cannot be regarded as an authority supporting the contention of the defendant. At the most and without discussion it simply affirms the proposition that actual seisin in the wife is not essential to curtesy in this State.

We must then recur to the question, What was decided in Bush v. Bradley? It seems to us that the construction claimed by the defendant's counsel ought manifestly to be the true one, to justify this court in taking a position utterly opposed to the settled law of all other jurisdictions. Instead of being manifest, it must be conceded to be very doubtful whether the court intended to go, or did go, beyond dispensing with the necessity of seisin in fact, and substituting a right to possession, or seisin in law. If not so in doubt how does it happen that on the one hand such able and accurate text writers as Washburn, Bishop, Sharwood and Williams, as well as others, restrict the decision to the above point; while on the other hand Chancellor Kent and some others seem to give the decision larger scope.

Referring to our own text-writers, we find it stated in 1 Swift's Digest, top page 87, that "in this State it has been decided that a legal right to lands without actual seisin or possession is sufficient to entitle the husband to curtesy." This fails to clear up the doubt, although it is consistent with the position that only actual and not constructive seisin is dispensed with.

In Dutton's Digest, p. 53, it is said: "In this State the husband may be a tenant by the curtesy of land to which the wife had title, but of which she was not actually seised during coverture." Kline v. Beede, 5 Conn. 499.

The same principle was previously adopted in Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 298, although a seisin in law of the wife during coverture is requisite."

It seems to us that this last sentence clearly shows that Judge Dutton construed these decisions precisely as we do. A mind so acute and well stored with legal definitions as was his must have understood that seisin in law in such connection is always used in contradistinction to a seisin in fact or in deed, and imports a right to the possession.

In Hawkins v. Shoven, 1 Sim. & Stu. 280, it is said that "seisin in deed is actual possession of the freehold, and seisin in law is a legal right to such possession."

Blackstone, in the citation previously made, makes the same distinction and gives the same definition to the term "seisin in law," and adds that "therefore a man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a remainder or reversion."

In 2 Bouvier's Law Dictionary, p. 509, it is said that "seisin in law is a right of immediate possession," and this we think is the precise idea that Judge Dutton intended by the same expression.

Our conclusion is that there is nothing in the decisions referred to, properly construed, to compel us to occupy the isolated position of holding that there can be curtesy in a remainder expectant upon a prior undetermined freehold.

It may be suggested that, if we discard actual seisin and still require seisin in law, we shall still be opposed to the great weight of judicial authority. This may be so; nevertheless, in holding a constructive seisin or as a requisite to support the estate; but jurists agree that it is not to be favored. Chancellor Kent says the extent of the law of curtesy may be justly complained of. The obvious reason is that it gives to the husband what would otherwise belong to the heir of the wife. It has no moral foundation to rest upon, and hence the spirit and tendency of the times is toward its abolition rather than its extension. The Legislature of this State twelve years ago abolished it as to all subsequent marriages, and several other States have done the same thing.

We advise the Superior Court to render judgment for the plaintiffs.

In this opinion Andrews, Ch. J., and Beardsley, J., concurred.

Pardoe, J., dissenting:

The question is, Can there be a tenancy by the curtesy in a reversion expectant upon a prior estate for life, that estate having extended beyond the life of the wife owning the reversion?

The answer in the negative, given by a majority of the court, is undoubtedly the law in most, if not in all, jurisdictions other than our own.

In Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 298, Josiah Woodhouse died, seised of the premises in question, in 1766. His son Robert inherited and occupied, and died seised in 1775. His only child, Mary, born in 1774, inherited; she intermarried with James Goldear in 1794, before she arrived at the age of twenty-one years. She continued a feme covert until her death in November, 1807, leaving her husband James Goldear living, having had children by him. These died before their mother. If they had survived her they could have inherited the premises. James Goldear had never been in actual possession of the premises. His wife had not been in possession since her intermarriage with him, for this reason, that the defendant, before 1788, more than twenty years prior to the commencement of the action, having purchased the premises for a valuable consideration, went into possession of the same, and from that time to the time of trial had held possession adversely to all others. The plaintiffs were the heirs at law of a sister of Josiah Woodhouse, the original owner. The defendant objected to a recovery on the ground that Goldear, being now living, was tenant by the curtesy of the premises, although neither he nor his wife had ever been in actual possession during coverture; and the court directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant on that ground solely. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial. The court said substantially as follows:

"As to the point respecting the curtesy, there is no question but what there must have been by the English law an actual seisin of the wife lish system. We have in some instances, when we have adopted the principles of the English law, extended them to cases which, by the adjudications of the English courts, have not been supposed to fall within the governing principle; in others we have adopted entirely different principles; and in all such cases where this has been done, which are pari ratione with those already settled, if we reject our own and adopt theirs, we shall mar the symmetry of our law; and the preservation of symmetry in our system I also view as a most important consideration. In England it is not sufficient that a man is proprietor of real property, and has a perfect right to it when he dies, to cause it to descend to his heirs-at-law. No, he must be actually seised thereof. The maxim is seisin facit stipitem; and the person that is heir to that property will be heir to him that was last seised. If A should die, who owns Whiteacre, which descended to him from his father, but has not been actually seised, leaving a brother of the half blood, B, and a sister, C, of the whole blood, this estate cannot descend to C, his sister and heir; for B, being of the half blood, cannot by their law inherit to his brother; but yet the same will descend to B, who is heir to his father, who was the last seised. Had A been seised, the estate would have descended to C. The maxim of seisin facit stipitem is an unyielding maxim of their law, and what governs the descent of property. But this is not our law. It is settled that it shall descend to the heirs of him who owns the property, whether he was seised or not. Seisin directs the descent with them; ownership with us.

"By the English law a devise will not operate upon real property of which the deviser is disseised. Seisin is an indispensable requisite to give effect to the devise. A devise, by our law, is good although a man is disseised. Seisin is necessary in their law and nothing but ownership in our law. We have always considered ownership of real property sufficient to maintain an action of trespass against every intruder; but by the English law actual possession by entry is necessary. We have always considered ownership as giving a right to possession of real property, as much so as ownership of personal property. Ownership in the one case draws after it the possession as much as in the other case; and whenever a right of possession is lost, all title and ownership are lost. So the Statute of Limitations respecting lands has always been construed. The Statute, in the words of it, does not take from the original proprietor his title; it only tolls his right of entry; and yet this Statute has been always considered as barring all claims of title, whilst the same words in the English Statute have been considered, not as having any effect on the title, but only on the right of entry, and the lands may be recovered by a form of proceeding proper for such a case. The English law distinguishes betwixt a right of possession and a right of property; but our law does not. Wherever there is a right to real property, there is of course a right of possession, and the Statute which takes away the right of possession, takes away the right of property; and this is the reason that this Statute has received a construction altogether different from the construction given to the English Statute; and this is perfectly analogous to every other case of real property in this State. Wherever you find a right of property you find a right of possession, and all the consequences of ownership attending it that you find in England where there is an actual seisin; and, on the other hand, where there is no right of possession there is no ownership. So in this case, Mary Goldear had title to the land, and though not actually seised, her husband acquired the same rights on her death as if she had been seised. Since seisin is not necessary in case of descent to the heirs, neither is necessary to pass lands by a devise, why should it be thought necessary to the husband's title by the curtesy?

"The decision of the court in this case is no departure from fixed rules and precedents. The departure from the English rule respecting the efficacy of seisin has long since been departed from; and to adhere to it in this case would mar the symmetry of our law."

In Kline v. Beebe, 6 Conn. 494, it is said in the marginal note that "in this State the husband may be tenant by the curtesy of land to which the wife had title, but of which she was not actually seised, during the coverture," citing Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 298.

In 4 Kent's Commentaries, 5th ed. 30, it is said as follows: "The rule has been carried still further in this country; and in one State, where the title by curtesy is in other respects as in England, it is decided that it was sufficient for the claim of curtesy that the wife had title to the land, though she was not actually seised nor deemed to be so. The law of curtesy in Connecticut is made to symmetrize with other parts of their system, and in that State ownership without seisin is sufficient to govern the descent or devise of real estate,"—citing Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 298, and Kline v. Beebe, 6 Conn. 494.

A vested remainder expectant upon a life estate is a fixed present right of property, alienable, devisable, descendible; indeed it has all of the incidents of any other kind of present interest in real property. Ownership of, that is, the present right of property in, the reversion expectant upon a life estate, stands upon a plane with ownership of the fee. And upon the cited precedents in this court, ownership is perfect in utter disregard of the question as to possession. Ownership has displaced and stands for the actual seisin, the investiture by turf and twig of the common law. It matters not that the rightful owner in fee is kept from possession by a tortfeasor, or by rightful possession by the life tenant. In each case alike there is a valuable vested present right of property, susceptible of ownership in the highest sense. To such ownership, in both cases, tenancy by the curtesy is legally incident equally.

George A. MOREY.

(47 Ohio St.....)

*1. Sec. 5027, Rev. Stat., prescribing the counties within which a railroad company may be sued, relates solely to the jurisdiction of the person, and it is not necessary that the petition should state that its road passes into or through the county where the action is brought; a railroad company, like a natural person, submits itself to the jurisdiction of the court by appearing for any other purpose than to object to such jurisdiction.

2. Where a written proposition is made by one party, which, after a parol modification of some of its terms has been made, is accepted by the other party in parol, such written proposition is the best evidence of so much of the resulting contract as it contains.

3. One who causes work to be done is not liable, ordinarily, for injuries that result from carelessness in its performance by the employees of an independent contractor to whom he has let the work, without reserving to himself any control over the execution of it. But this principle has no application where a resulting injury, instead of being collateral and flowing from the negligent act of the employé alone, is one that might have been anticipated as a direct or probable consequence of the performance of the work contracted for, if reasonable care is omitted in the course of its performance. In such case the person causing the work to be done will be liable though the negligence is that of an employé of an independent contractor.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Fayette County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff and his horse by reason of their falling into an unguarded ditch for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

Statement by Bradbury, J.:

The defendant in error, George A. Morey, brought in the Court of Common Pleas of Fayette County an action against the Southern Ohio Railroad Company, plaintiff in error, to recover damages claimed to have been sustained by him on account of himself and horse falling into a ditch that the plaintiff in error had caused to be dug, and left unguarded across Water Street, in the Town of Washington, in said county, on the night of November 9, 1885.

The record discloses that the plaintiff in error, at the time of the accident, owned and operated a railroad which ran through said Town of Washington, and occupied part of said Water Street, with its tracks, and owned and occupied a depot situate on lots owned by it that were adjacent to said street. That the ditch causing the injury had been dug during the day, the night of which the accident occurred, for the purpose of laying tiling for a drain from the depot above mentioned; that the ditch was dug entirely across that part of said street which was, or could be, used for travel; that it was from four to six or seven feet deep, about two and one half feet wide at the top, and about two feet wide at its bottom, and the earth from it thrown out two or three feet high on both sides; that the night was very dark, and the ditch left wholly unguarded; that the defendant in error, having no knowledge that the ditch had been dug, and without fault on his part, fell into it, together with his horse, and thereby received the injuries of which he complained, and that the ditch was, in fact, dug by a man employed by the firm of R. P. Willis & Son, who did the plumbing work for the depot.

The main contention between the parties at the trial was whether this plumbing was done under such an independent contract as would exonerate the Railroad Company from liability for the negligence of the contractor and his immediate servants.

The defendant in error recovered a judgment in the court of common pleas, which the circuit affirmed, and this proceeding was brought to reverse both judgments.

Any further statement of the facts requisite to a decision of the case will be found in the opinion.

Messrs. W. O. Henderson, C. W. Fairbanks and Pavey & Pavey for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Van Deman & Chaffin for defendant in error.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Plaintiff in error contends that § 5027, Rev. Stat., prescribing the counties within which a railroad company may be sued, renders the action local, and to give the court jurisdiction of it, the petition must show that the railroad runs through or into the county where the action is brought, and that if it does not so appear, the defect can be reached by a general demurrer. In this view we do not concur. "The division of personal actions into local and transitory is not known in Ohio." Genin v. Grier, 10 Ohio, 209.

This doctrine is as applicable to our present method of procedure as it was to that in use in 1840, when it was announced by this court. Section 5027 provides that "an action against a railroad company may be brought in any county through or into which such road . . . passes." This section, like the other sections of chapter 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that merely prescribe the county in which a defendant may be sued, relate only to the jurisdiction over the person. Neither a railroad company nor other corporation, nor even a natural person, is bound to appear in an action in obedience to a summons served out of the prescribed county. It is a privilege, however, that is personal, and may be waived; and this court has uniformly held that a defendant by appearing in court, and, without objecting to its jurisdiction over his person, invoking any action in the cause, waives this privilege, and submits his person to the jurisdiction of the court. Harrington v. Heath, 15 Ohio, 488, 487, 488; Gilliland v. Sellers, 2 Ohio St. 228; Wood v. O'Ferrall, 19 Ohio St. 427; Thomas v. Pennrich, 28 Ohio St. 55; Fitzgerald v. Cross, 80 Ohio St. 450; O'Neal v. Blessing, 84 Ohio St. 83; Handy v. Ins. Co. 37 Ohio St. 866; Elliott v. Lawhead, 43 Ohio St. 171, 1 West. Rep. 162.

The plaintiff in error not only appeared without objecting to the jurisdiction of the court of common pleas over its person, but moved to strike from the petition certain averments deemed by it to be objectionable, and on that motion being overruled, filed a general demurrer to the petition, which being in turn overruled, it filed an answer, and went to trial upon the merits. It thus, in the most ample manner, submitted its person to the jurisdiction of the court.

2. After the plaintiff below had introduced his evidence, counsel for the Railroad Company moved the court to arrest it from the jury, and to direct a verdict in its favor on the ground that it did not tend to prove the facts in issue. This motion was overruled and this ruling is now before us for review. The only controverted averment of the petition which it is contended the evidence did not tend to prove, is that which states that the plaintiff in error, defendant below, caused the ditch to be dug. That the plaintiff in error owned the lots upon which the depot stood, and used and occupied the depot was averred in the petition and not denied by the answer; the evidence of the plaintiff below showed that the ditch was dug for the purpose of draining the depot, and that the agent of the Railroad Company was present and knew that it was being done. This we think not only tended to prove that the Railroad Company caused the ditch to be dug, but was sufficient to establish that fact prima facie at least.

One observing a ditch freshly dug and extending from a valuable building to a lower level, on being informed that it was to be used for the purpose of draining the building, would be fully justified in inferring from those facts that the owner of the building caused the ditch to be dug.

3. The plaintiff in error in attempting to show that the ditch was dug by an independent contractor, for whose negligence it was not responsible, offered evidence tending to prove that it was dug by R. P. Willis & Son, gas fitters and plumbers of Springfield, O., in putting the water-closets, urinals, etc., in the depot. It was shown that this firm had submitted to the Railroad Company a written proposition, containing the terms on which they would perform the work, and that, with two parol modifications, it was accepted in parol by the Railroad Company, and the work awarded to them. Counsel for the Railroad Company then attempted to prove by parol this entire contract. To this objection was made by counsel for plaintiff below on the ground that the written proposition in so far as it contained the terms of the contract was the best evidence thereof; this view was adopted by the court and the parol evidence excluded. In this there was no error. A contract may rest partly in writing and partly in parol, and in that case while the part resting in parol must of necessity be proved by parol, nevertheless the writing itself is the best evidence of the part thereof of which it contains. This proposition rests not only upon principle, but is supported by numerous authorities, only a limited number of which need to be cited. 2 Parsons, Cont. 553; Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. v. Anderson, 23 Minn. 57; Thurston v. Ludwig, 6 Ohio St. 1-8.

4. The record discloses a number of other questions that counsel for the Railroad Company propounded to its witnesses, but except in two instances the testimony the witness was expected to give does not appear at all, and in the other two only inferentially as follows: "The defendant, proposing to prove that R. P. Willis & Son had never done any work for defendant as its agent or servant, asked the following question of John S. Willis: Did you ever do any work for the Ohio Southern Railroad Company as the agent or servant of said Company?"

This question was objected to by counsel for plaintiff below, and ruled out by the court, to which exception was taken. Conceding that the introduction to the question sufficiently states what counsel expected to prove by the witness, yet there was no error in the ruling of the court for the question was leading in form; but had it been free from fault in this respect yet the evidence to be given in response to it as indicated by the introduction was not competent. It was not the province of the witness to state whether or not the firm of R. P. Willis & Son was the agent or servant of the Railroad Company in what they did; that depended upon the contract under which they operated. It was competent for the witness to state the terms of the contract in so far as they could be established by parol, but the relation which they bore to their employers was a question for the jury under proper instructions from the court.

5. The only serious question in the case is presented by charges given or refused by the court.

The court among other things charged the jury as follows:

"If the necessary or probable effect of the performance of the work would be to injure third persons, or create a nuisance, then the defendant is not relieved from liability, because the work was done by a contractor over which it had no control in the mode and manner of doing it."

To this the plaintiff in error excepted.

The question is here presented whether the owner of real estate who causes work to be done in relation to it the probable consequences of the performance of which will be to endanger others or to create a nuisance, can shift from himself all responsibility for these probable consequences by letting the work to an independent contractor over whom he reserves no control? Will a sound public policy permit this to be done? If so, then we may expect the prudent proprietor, when he has work to be done which involves these probable consequences, to provide for its performance by a carefully guarded contract by which he retains no control over it whatever.

The case of Clark v. Fry, 8 Ohio St. 353, is relied upon by counsel for plaintiff in error.

builder and yielded to him during the entire period covered by the construction the exclusive possession and control of the premises. The plan of the building and the contract for its construction contemplated an excavation for an area extending six feet into the street, which was about eighty feet wide, and the record leaves it in doubt whether the excavation extended out to the traveled sidewalk or not, and it nowhere appears that it caused any material interruption of or inconvenience to transit along the street by the public. The excavation was made by a sub-contractor, and Fry without fault fell into it, receiving injuries therefrom, for which he brought suit. Clark set up the contract in defense of the action, under that state of facts. The trial court charged the jury that the excavation was unlawful and created a nuisance, for which Clark was liable. This was held to be error. The question involved in that part of the charge in this case now under consideration was not discussed by the court in Clark v. Fry, supra. The court there, indeed, laid down the rule, that where the thing to be done under the contract was unlawful or necessarily injurious to third persons, the employer as well as the employé would be liable for an injury resulting therefrom, but there was nothing in the issues made by the pleadings or in the charge of the court that presented the questions which are raised by the charge of the court now under review. That one upon whom the law devolves a duty cannot shift it over upon another so as to exonerate himself from the consequences of its nonperformance is, we think, quite clear (Shearn & Redf. Neg. §§ 174-176, Railroad v. Van Dorn, 1 Circuit Ct. Rep. 292, Wood, Nat. and B. § 316, Wharton, Neg. § 185), and we think it equally clear that the law devolves upon everyone about to cause something to be done which will probably be injurious to third persons the duty of providing that reasonable care shall be taken to obviate those probable consequences.

In this class of cases the doctrine of respondeat superior has no application; his liability is based upon the principle that he cannot set in operation causes dangerous to the person or property of others without taking all reasonable precautions to anticipate, obviate and prevent these probable consequences. This doctrine was recognized by Judge McIlvaine in Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co., 39 Ohio St. 470, in the following language: "The employer cannot relieve himself from liability by contracting with others for the performance of work, where the necessary or probable effect of the performance of the work will be to injure third persons." German v. Steubenville & I. R. Co. 4 Ohio St. 800; Circleville v. Nauding, 41 Ohio St. 405, Bower v. Prate, L. R. 1 Q. B. 131v 321.

The court also charged the jury as follows: "The making of an excavation across a public highway, which materially interferes with public travel, is an unlawful act, unless authorized by proper authority, and this because such excavation creates a nuisance. If the defendant caused such an excavation to be made, it cannot shield itself from liability if injury result, unless it caused all reasonable precaution to be taken to prevent such injury."

This proposition also is claimed to be in conflict with the rule laid down by the court in Clark v. Fry, supra. This may be true if it is so regarded as the enunciation of a general proposition applicable to all excavations made in a public highway, or even to all ditches dug across them; but the doctrine of Clark v. Fry is not to be extended beyond the facts upon which it rests. Since that case (Clark v. Fry, supra) arose, the Legislature has declared it to be an offense to obstruct a highway, street or alley. § 6921, Rev. Stat.

Notwithstanding this Statute, however, we do not want to be understood as holding that in all cases where an excavation is made in a highway, street or alley it necessarily constitutes a nuisance. The issues in the case before us, however, were widely different from those in Clark v. Fry, supra, as was the extent and character of the excavation. In the case before us the only question, except as to the amount of damages, submitted to the jury, was whether or not the Railroad Company caused the excavation to be made. The record discloses that no contention was in fact had over any other material fact. That the ditch causing the accident extended entirely across the highway was not disputed, and from its depth and width it could not be otherwise than highly dangerous to everyone who might in the night-time pass along the street across which it was dug, and the language of the court must be construed in connection with the undisputed facts, the issue being tried and the evidence material to it. There was evidence tending to show that the plan of the work prepared by the engineer of the railroad contemplated that the drain would cross the street at this particular point. The ditch was dug in the usual way and the agent of the defendant at Washington had full knowledge of the place where and the manner in which it was being dug. The chief engineer who let the contract testified that he did not at the time know of the existence of the street. This was no excuse; he was bound to take notice of public highways, but it is a strong circumstance tending to show that the Railroad Company caused the ditch to be dug and left exposed in the manner in which it was in fact done; it was supposed by them to be on their own premises, and that no duty rested on them toward travelers who might intrude themselves there. On no other theory can the indifference of all who were concerned in digging the ditch and leaving it exposed be explained. It would have been criminally careless in them to have left over night in a highway, known by them to be such, a pitfall so dangerous as this was shown to be.

There was evidence, therefore, from which the jury could find that the railroad caused this ditch to be dug in the particular manner that the work was done, and if the jury so found it was liable for the consequences whether it did so by its own servants, or by the hand of an independent contractor.

"A ditch cannot be dug in a public street and left open and unguarded at night without imminent danger of such casualties. If they do occur who is the author of the mischief? Is it not he who causes the ditch to be dug, whether he does it with his own hands, employs laborers, or lets it out by contract? If by contract then I admit that the contractor must respond to third parties if his servants or laborers are negligent in the immediate execution of the work. But the ultimate superior or proprietor first determines the excavation shall be made, and then selects his own contractor. Can he escape responsibility for putting a public street in a condition dangerous for travel at night by interposing the contract which he himself has made for the very thing which creates the danger? I should answer this question in the negative. Comstock, J.,

"Where the obstruction or defect caused or created in the street is purely collateral to the work contracted to be done, and is entirely the result of the wrongful acts of the contractor or his workmen, the rule is that the employer is not liable; but where the obstruction or defect which occasioned the injury results directly from the acts which the contractor agreed and was authorized to do, the person who employs the contractor and authorizes him to do those acts is equally liable to the injured party."

There was no error in the charge.

Judgment affirmed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

J. H. SNODDY, Pff. in Err.,
v.
AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK.

(.....Tenn.....)

A negotiable note is not valid, even in the hands of a bona fide holder, where it grows out of a wager contract, which is made a crime by statute, and a transfer of such note to a party ignorant of its illegality is also made a crime, although the statute does not expressly declare that such note shall be void in the hands of innocent holders.

NOTE.—Promissory note, when invalid.

To entitle a purchaser of a note which was illegal or fraudulent in its inception to recover thereon, he must have been a good-faith purchaser. Goodrich v. McDonald (Mich.) 48 N. W. Rep. 1019; Manning v. Manning, 8 Ala. 188; Ivey v. Nicks, 14 Ala. 564; Fuller v. Hutchings, 10 Cal. 523.

A note given to secure the payee for margins advanced by him to the maker upon a joint option contract in grain, there being no intention to actually receive or deliver or pay for the grain, is without valid consideration; and when the maker sets up such defense, there can be no recovery. Davis v. Davis, 119 Ind. 511.

The defense that a note was given in pursuance of an unlawful contract is available to the indorser. Jones v. Hanna, 81 Cal. 507.

The defense that the contract sued on was a wagering contract must be specially pleaded. It cannot be shown under the general issue. Comiskey v. Williams, 2 West. Rep. 604, 20 Mo. App. 606.

But the plea need not state the kind of game. Jordan v. Locke, 1 Minor (Ala.) 254.

Evidence of the uniform habit of the maker of a note to gamble when drunk is not admissible to show that a promissory note made by him was given for money lost at play. Thompson v. Bowie, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 463 (18 L. ed. 423).

Where there is no evidence whatever that a written contract was a gambling contract on the prices of produce, evidence of what other people intend by other contracts of a similar character, however numerous, is not competent to prove the contract to be of that character. Bountree v. Smith, 108 U. S. 209 (27 L. ed. 722).

Generally, in this country all wagering contracts are held to be illegal and void as against public policy. Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499 (28 L. ed. 225). See note to Harvey v. Merrill (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 200.

A policy of life insurance payable to one who has no insurable interest in the life of the insured is a wagering policy and void. Cammack v. Lewis, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 643 (21 L. ed. 244); Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457 (24 L. ed. 251); Etna L. Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 561 (24 L. ed. 287); Warneck v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775 (26 L. ed. 924); Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Luocha, 108 U. S. 498 (27 L. ed. 800).

A note given for a bet on an election is void. Russell v. Pyland, 2 Humph. 131.

One who sells a note which is void in his hands on grounds of public policy, fraudulently representing it to be good, is liable to the purchaser for the money paid therefor, when the maker has refused payment, although the purchaser, as a bona fide holder, might have collected it from the maker. Evans v. Stuhberg (Mich.) 6 L. R. A. 501.

A bond given for money won at a horse race, or to secure a forfeiture for failure to run a horse at the race, is void. Tatham v. Strader, 23 Ill. 496; Hayden v. Little, 35 Mo. 422; Shropshire v. Glascock, 4 Mo. 536; Boynston v. Curle, 4 Mo. 599.

A due bill given by an agent for the sale of lottery tickets is not enforceable in the courts. Lanahan v. Pattison, 1 Flipp. 410; Rothrock v. Perkins, 61 Ind. 39.

A lease of premises to be used for the sale of lottery tickets is void. Edelmuth v. McGarren, 4 Daly, 467.

For other cases, see Yellowstone Kit v. State (Ala.) ante, 699.

Securities given for money lost at play.

A note or other security given in consideration of money won at gambling is void. Munroe v. Smelly, 25 Tex. 586; Conner v. Mackey, 20 Tex. 747.

Notes given for a gaming consideration are void even in the hands of a bona fide holder for value without notice of the illegality of the consideration. Chapin v. Duke, 57 Ill. 296; Eagle v. Kohn, 84 Ill. 232; Unger v. Boas, 13 Pa. 601; Vallett v. Parker, 6 Wend. 615; Pace v. Martin, 2 Duv. (Ky.) 522; Holman v. Ringo, 36 Miss. 690.

So a note given for money lent to gamble with is void. Williams v. Judy, 8 Ill. 282; Buckman v. Bryan, 8 Denio, 840; Morgan v. Groff, 5 Denio, 864; Tidmore v. Boyce, 2 Mill. Const. Rep. (S. C.) 200; Mordecai v. Dawkins, 9 Rich. L. 268; Machir v. Moore, 2 Gratt. 237.

So the indorsement of a valid draft in payment of a gambling debt conveys no title. Williams v. Wall, 60 Mo. 318.

But where a person who has lost money at gambling gives his note to a third person, who thereupon pays an adequate consideration to the winner, the note is not void. Jones v. Sevier, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 50; Mooring v. Stanton, Mart. (N. C.) 53.

So where an innocent holder is induced to take a note given in consideration of money won at gambling, by the representations of the maker, he may recover. Manning v. Manning, 5 Ala. 138; Fuller v. Hutchings, 10 Cal. 523; Ivey v. Nicks, 14 Ala. 564. Compare Carson v. Lambert, 2 Bay, 560.

The same rule applies to the assignee of a bond given for a gambling consideration. Woodson v. Barrett, 2 Hen. & Mun. 80; Buckner v. Smith, 1 Wash. (Va.) 296.

The assignment of a bill of goods lost at a gambling table, unaccompanied by actual delivery of the goods, is no consideration for a note or check. Hockaday v. Willis, 1 Speers, L. 379.

Bonds given for a gambling consideration are invalid.

A bond to convey land, given for a gambling consideration, does not bind the obligor; but if it be assigned to a bona fide purchaser for value, and conveyance of the land be made to him, neither the obligor nor his heirs can afterward question the consideration where the statute against gambling vitiates deeds only in the hands of the winner. Chiles v. Coleman, 2 A. K. Marsh. 206.

So where one obtains a bond by gambling and collects part of it from the obligor, who gives a new bond for the balance, such new bond is invalid, the original bond being based on a gambling consideration. Stone v. Mitchell, 7 Ark. 91.

A bond taken on the compromise of an action on a gambling contract, if the money won is a part of the consideration, is void. Turner v. Peacock, 2 Dev. L. 303.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for De Kalb County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a promissory note which was alleged to be void because founded upon a wagering consideration. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Dan Williams for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John M. Gaut and Will. T. Hale, for defendant in error:

The money was advanced by Williams & Co., after the transaction was closed and the loss incurred, and was simply a loan of money made by the agent to the principal not to induce him to enter into an illegal transaction, or to carry through one already entered upon, but simply to pay his loss, after it had already been sustained; and a note given therefor was valid.

Marshall v. Thurston, 3 Lea, 740.

In the absence of positive enactment, a bona fide holder of a bill or note may recover thereon, if he had no notice of the illegality at the time he became the holder.

Chitty, Bills, pp. 81, 82.

The "positive enactment" referred to means a positive enactment not merely that the gaming contract shall be void but that all negotiable instruments based thereon shall be void.

Lowe v. Waller, 2 Doug. (Eng.) 736; Vallett v. Parker, 6 Wend. 617; Chitty, Bills, 81, 82, 104, 105; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 197, 198.

Snodgrass, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case is whether an innocent holder of a note founded on a gaming consideration can recover of the maker. The note sued on was void in the hands of the payee. It was given in settlement of loss sustained by plaintiff in error while dealing in futures with Williams & Co. There was no intent to take or deliver grain pretended to be purchased on the one hand or sold on the other. The contract to do so was therefore gaming, and void by express statute. Act 1883, p. 331; McGrew v. City Produce Exchange, 85 Tenn. 572.

Nor does it matter that Williams & Co. pretended to be, or were, mere agents in the transaction. They knew of and participated in its illegality, and could maintain no action on the note given them for the loss sustained by their alleged principal. Beadles v. Owenby, 16 Lea, 424.

But they transferred the note taken by them in settlement of the loss sustained by plaintiff in error to the American National Bank, before due, for value; and the Bank had no notice of the illegality of consideration. It is therefore insisted the Bank may recover as an innocent holder, and the circuit judge so held.

Our Statute makes all wagering contracts void to the extent of the wagering consideration, and provides that no money or property won by any species or mode of gaming shall be recovered by action, and that any money or property so paid or delivered may be recovered back by the payor, his wife, children, next of kin or creditors. Code, § 2438 et seq.

The particular species of gaming now being considered is made a misdemeanor, and punished as such, the limitation as to the least punishment being more severe than that of ordinary gaming. Act 1883, § 8.

Thus it appears that such contract is not only against public morals, and public policy, and public statute,—malum in se, and malum prohibitum,—and that it is declared void, but it is also made a crime, and punished as such. The general rule that, as between the innocent holder and the maker, the consideration cannot be inquired into, is subject to the exception that it may be done if the consideration was gaming or usurious. 3 Kent, Com. 9th ed. 99.

By the great weight of authority, notes given in consideration of a contract against morals, public policy and public statute are void in any hands. 2 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 368, and notes.

Perhaps there are no exceptions where, in addition, the transaction is also criminal.

It is insisted, however, that the Statutes referred to do not in express terms declare that negotiable notes so executed are void in the hands of innocent holders, and that, unless the Statute so declares, they will be held good; and for this proposition Chitty on Bills, 104, 105, Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, §§ 197, 198, and several cases are cited. But these authorities (and to the same effect is § 192, Story on Promissory Notes, from which Mr. Daniel copies the greater part of sections cited) show that the Statute need not expressly declare such notes void. If it does so by necessary implication, it is sufficient. We hold that the Statutes referred to do by necessary implication make such notes void, in making the contract under which they are executed void and criminal. But the Statute goes further. It affirmatively shows that such negotiable notes are not to be used, and makes the transfer of such a note to a party ignorant of its illegality a criminal offense. Code, §§ 2444, 5708.

It results, therefore, that the Bank cannot maintain an action on the note in controversy, and the judgment of the circuit judge must be reversed, and judgment entered here in favor of plaintiff in error. The costs of both courts will be paid by the Bank.

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Davidson County, in favor of defendant in a suit by an alleged creditor of an insolvent corporation to enforce payment of his claim out of assets in the hands of its assignee, in which a cross-bill was filed to enforce complainant's liability upon his stock subscription. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. B. Rucker and Whitman & Gamble, for appellant:

Mr. Cartwright was never a stockholder in this company, for he simply subscribed for eighty shares of stock, but did not pay for one of them. A subscriber is not a stockholder, but has only placed himself in a position to become one.

Cook, Stock and Stockholders, No. 4, § 208.

When stock has been subscribed and paid for, and, before a certificate is issued to the subscriber, another subscribes, pays for and secures a certificate of stock, the remedy of the first subscriber is not against the company and the certificate-holder to set aside the certificate, and have the company issue him one, but against the company to recover his money back, and damages for the breach of the contract.

Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 74.

For the refusal of the corporation to issue original stock to a subscriber the measure of damages is the difference between the price contracted for and the market value on the day when the issue ought to have been made.

Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 74, note 8; Van Allen v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 7 Bosw. 515; Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Sewell, 35 Md. 238; Finley Shoe & L. Co. v. Kurtz, 34 Mich. 89; Wallace v. Townsend, 1 West. Rep. 806, 43 Ohio St. 537.

The company reported that it had paid back to Cartwright $2,000. A corporation has the right to purchase its own stock.

The directors or trustees of a company are incompetent to release an original subscriber, or to make any arrangement with him by which the company, its creditors or the State shall lose all of the benefit of his subscription. Putnam v. New Albany & S. C. J. R. Co. ("Burke v. Smith") 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 390 (21 L. ed. 361); Upton v. Tribblecock, 91 U. S. 45 (23 L. ed. 203); Bouton v. Dement, 11 West. Rep. 437, 123 Ill. 142.

No by-law or resolution of the stockholders of a corporation, opposed to the rights of creditors, can authorize the release of the obligation of a solvent stockholder to pay for stock taken by him, even though such release be in consideration of his surrendering his stock. Farnsworth v. Robbins, 36 Minn. 398.

The liability imposed upon stockholders is a security over which corporate authorities have no control; it is not a primary source for payment of the corporation debts. Falkenbach v. Patterson, 1 West. Rep. 159, 43 Ohio St. 359.

A provision in the charter of a bank that stockholders shall be liable to the amount of their stock means liable in a sum equal to the amount of the balance unpaid of the subscription for stock. Root v. Slinnack, 6 West. Rep. 674, 120 Ill. 360.

Capital stock a trust fund.

The capital stock of the corporation defendant, and any unpaid portions of such capital stock, must be considered in equity as a trust fund specifically charged with the payment of the debts of the corporation. *Nathan v. Lurton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Grubbs Cracker Company is a corporation organized July, 1885, under the General Incorporation Law of this State. In October, 1887, being insolvent, it made a deed of assignment to Dickinson as trustee, to equally secure all creditors. The original bill was filed by Cartwright, claiming to be a creditor of the corporation, for the purpose of enforcing payment out of the assets in defendant's hands. One of the demands set up is not now resisted. The other is contested as being without consideration. The assignee, after answering, filed a cross-bill to recover some $6,000 alleged to be due upon unpaid calls on stock owned by Cartwright in the Cracker Company, and to recover $1,000 paid back to him by the secretary and treasurer of that company upon an alleged insufficient cancellation and rescission of his liability as a subscriber for stock. Cartwright, before the charter was obtained, subscribed for $8,000 of the stock of the proposed corporation. A charter was obtained by the usual application provided for by the Act of 1875. The subscribers thereupon met, and organized, by accepting the charter, adopting by-laws and electing directors. He was present at this meeting, and was elected a director, and acted as such for a year thereafter.

The Act of 1875 does not require the amount of the capital stock of a corporation to be stated in the application for the charter, but authorizes the capital to be fixed subsequently by by-laws. Such a by-law was adopted at the organization, and the capital settled at $40,000, to be divided into shares of $100 each. A few the receipt of the secretary and treasurer for that sum, as a payment upon his stock. The remainder of the sum due, $8,000, he has never paid, and now claims that his contract has been canceled or rescinded, and that he is not liable therefor. The facts upon which this defense is placed are these: In July, 1838, one year after the company began business, Cartwright, desiring to withdraw therefrom, spoke to Mr. Grubbs, and asked him to dispose of his stock. Grubbs was the brother-in-law of Cartwright, was the largest stockholder in the corporation, and was its secretary and treasurer and general manager. Grubbs, it seems, did accordingly undertake to dispose of his stock, which appears at that date to have been payable at par, September 2, 1838. Grubbs told him he had made a disposition of the shares, and by his direction the proper entries were made on the books of the company, by which the balance due as for unpaid calls was charged off, and the $3,000 theretofore paid in on first call was credited to the personal account of Cartwright. Of this credit, $800 were then paid in cash, same being credited on the stock receipt previously taken for amount of first call. Subsequently this receipt was surrendered, and the note of the corporation executed to Cartwright for the remainder. This note was afterwards reduced by payment, and a new note executed which is the smaller of the two demands upon which the original bill is filed.

What Grubbs did, which he supposed authorized him to rescind the contract by which Cartwright had purchased shares, was this: He went upon the streets, and solicited new subscriptions to the stock of his company; and when he had obtained these he regarded himself as authorized to rescind the contract of Cartwright, and release him from all obligation as a shareholder indebted on account of his shares. To carry out his purpose, he caused the books to show that Cartwright, instead of being debtor, was a creditor, to the extent of the capital which he was allowed to withdraw. The proof does not show any transfer of Cartwright's stock to other persons, or any agreement that it should be transferred to others, or that they should be substituted to his rights and liabilities. There is no pretense of the purchase of shares from Cartwright by other persons. On the contrary, they were procured to subscribe for new shares, just as Cartwright had done in the first instance.

Before the organization of the corporation, and acceptance of the subscription of Cartwright, the promoters might, perhaps, agree to release a subscriber by substituting other names for his, and erasing from the list that of the recalcitrant. Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 75.

But, at the moment when the conditions required by law as preliminary to the granting of a charter were complied with, the subscribers became shareholders, entitled to a voice, as shareholders, in all subsequent proceedings, and to compel a specific performance of the contract of membership. At the same time, all the obligations of a shareholder were assumed, and the liability to pay the amount of upon the shares is a mere incident of membership; and the fact that such payments have not been made does not affect the status of the member as a shareholder until a forfeiture has been declared in such manner as provided by the charter. The fact that certificates of shares have not been issued does not affect the question. Such certificate is never essential to constitute one a shareholder, being mere evidence of ownership of shares. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 56, and cases cited.

This view of the effect of a certificate has been heretofore settled in this State. Cornick v. Richards, 3 Lea, 1; State v. Bader, 86 Tenn. 621; Young v. South Tredgar Iron Co. 85 Tenn. 180.

It follows that Cartwright was the owner of eighty shares of the capital stock of this corporation. This stock he has never assigned or transferred to any other person. No other person claims to own his stock, or to be in any way legally or equitably entitled to have it transferred to him. The cancellation of his subscription was inoperative to cancel his shares, or discharge his obligations to pay for them. Unless the charter authorizes a forfeiture of shares for nonpayment of calls, there is no power in the corporation to forfeit, cancel or annul shares once lawfully issued. The contract of shareholders is a mutual one. Without the consent of all, one cannot be released from liability. Even a board of directors cannot discharge the contract of a shareholder to pay for his shares according to his contract, or disfranchise him by a forfeiture declared without express authority of law. Chase v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 5 Lea, 415; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 300, and cases cited.

The argument that, if in fact the corporation received from their new subscribers the same amount of money which Cartwright was to contribute, in that case, whatever was done would in effect be the substitution of the capital of one for that which another was bound to contribute, is plausible, but is unsound in law, and unsustained by the facts of this case,—unsound in law, because the mere fact of obtaining certain new and original capital cannot operate to empower the corporation to return capital theretofore embarked in the enterprise. These new subscribers, by their subscription, undertook to contribute additional capital, and not to substitute their capital for money to be withdrawn. This was not their engagement. This is the difference between the purchase of Cartwright's shares and the subscribing for new shares, and the distinction between the effect of buying shares already issued and subscribing for new shares. In the latter case, new capital is contributed, while in the former only the legal title of shares is changed. The new subscriber, as well as the old, had a right to demand that every shareholder be compelled to pay his shares up according to contract. There was no more authority to cancel Cartwright's shares, and release him from liability, after this additional capital was contributed than there was before. The contention is not sound in fact. Mr. Grubbs seems to have supposed that he had the right to release shareholders from their obligations, just as suited them or him. He seems likewise to have supposed that he was authorized to take new subscribers, to take the place of such as chose to withdraw, and to furnish new capital as the necessities of the business demanded.

The share list shows several shareholders, who, after experimenting with the cracker business, withdrew, and had their money returned. So, when Mr. Grubbs undertook to get new stock, to take the place of old stock owned by Cartwright, he seems to have had other arrangements of some sort to carry out; for he says that he got these new subscribers to "cover" Cartwright's stock, and that of others to whom he made the same promise. The fact that the authorized limit of $40,000 had been reached does not seem to have been any embarrassment whatever. He says he got an amount of new subscriptions, after he agreed to place Cartwright's stock, equal to his, or greater. In this he is shown, by a careful examination of the stock list, to have been mistaken. The total of stock subscriptions July 1, 1886, was $50,000. The stock in October, 1886, inclusive of Cartwright's, was about $57,000. Then, to cover Cartwright's $8,000, and that of others to whom he had made the same promise, there could not have been over $7,000 obtained. Then it is not even the case of money of a new subscriber having fully taken the place of an old one suffered to withdraw. That the corporation at the time had actually received the full sum of $40,000, and that that was the limit of its authorized capital, cannot avail Cartwright. If the shares subscribed after the limits of $40,000 had been reached were valid and lawful, then the corporation was entitled to a much larger sum than $40,000. If, on the other hand, these subscriptions were void, then they were not enforceable, and money actually paid could not be lawfully held, if demanded by such subscriber, creditors out of the way. If the transaction be looked at as a purchase of the shares held by the corporation, then it is equally ineffective. Whatever power a corporation may have to deal in its own shares for purpose of sale, or to secure a debt, it is too clear for argument that it cannot reduce its authorized capital by purchasing its own shares for cancellation. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 111-118.

The case of Jackson v. Sligo M. & M. Co., 1 Lea, 210, does not hold a contrary doctrine, as argued by counsel. The sale of stock sustained in that case was not a sale to the corporation, but to one Sloan, a stranger.

The next defense urged is that the corporation has violated its charter by increasing its capital stock, and that it has already issued stock certificates in excess of its lawful capital, and that therefore it is not in the power of the corporation to issue valid shares to him. The capital fixed by by-law, of $40,000, was, as we have already seen, exceeded by the action of Grubbs, in obtaining subscriptions in excess of that limit. This was unauthorized by the shareholders, or the directors. Such subscriptions for new shares, after $40,000 had been taken, were null and void. In February, 1887, the shareholders amended their by-laws so as to increase their authorized capital to $100,000. This was intended to legalize the excess of shares already taken, and authorized a further increase. Under this amendment new stock was taken, until the whole list reached about $76,000. After the assignment to Dickinson, a scheme for the reorganization of this business was conceived, and the shareholders again amended their by laws so as to declare all stock theretofore issued "common" stock, and to authorize issuance of "preferred" stock to the amount of $30,000, the latter to have a preference, to the extent of 6 per cent, in payment of dividends, over the common stock. It appears that under this scheme some $23,000 of preferred stock has been sold, thus bringing the total of shares, excluding Cartwright's, to something over $99,000. Neither of these amendments of the by-laws were made in pursuance of the Act of 1883, p. 212, concerning the amendment of charters so as to allow an increase of capital stock. The question as to whether the capital stock, having been once fixed by by-law, as provided by the General Incorporation Law of 1875, can be increased without an amendment of the charter in the manner pointed out by the Act of 1883, is a grave one, and is reserved, for the reason that, in the view we have of this case, it need not be decided. This question cannot affect Cartwright's liability to pay for his shares. By his subscription, as we have seen already, he became a shareholder. His shares are not affected by the subsequent issue of shares in excess of charter limits. If these shares were issued without power upon the part of the corporation to issue them, they are absolutely void, and confer no rights of membership upon those who hold them. In a contest between them and the holder of shares subscribed before the capital was all taken they would be excluded from all participation in the management or profits of the business. Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143 [26 L. ed. 968].

That the corporation has been guilty of a violation of its charter in this or any other matter is no defense to an action for calls due from a shareholder upon his shares. The remedy was against the corporation, to restrain such alleged illegal action, or is against the agents personally, for any wrong and injury done him. It furnishes no reason why he shall not carry out his own contract. The usual rule, by which the breach of a contract upon one side justifies its breach or abandonment by the other, has little application in cases of this character. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 116, and cases cited.

The question as to whether the issuance of preferred stock was valid and effectual as against shareholders not assenting then or subsequently we do not determine. Operative or inoperative, it does not affect the contract to pay for the shares by the owner because of his contract of subscription. The fact that he has not had notice of subsequent meetings of shareholders, or opportunity to attend, or protect himself against the action of the other shareholders affecting the value of his stock, cannot operate to release him from his contract. Neither the directors nor the shareholders had any knowledge of the arrangement by which he supposed he was released. In January, 1887, several months after his arrangement with Mr. Grubbs had been perfected, the latter informed the board of directors that there was a vacancy in the board, Mr. Cartwright having sold his stock. The vacancy was thereupon filled. The directors and shareholders thereafter assumed that his shares had been in fact sold to others. Grubbs, in so far as he undertook to dispose of his shares, was the agent of Cartwright in such disposition. If Cartwright was misled and deceived by the statement of Grubbs that he had sold his shares, and thereby lulled into a course of action or non-action, whereby he has suffered, he can look only to his agent for recoupment. If, on the other hand, he knew the exact facts upon which Grubbs assumed authority to cancel his shares, and acted either upon the opinion of Grubbs or his own opinion, or their concurrent opinion, that upon such facts the law empowered Grubbs to do what he did do, and that he had a legal right to release him from his contract, then both mistook the law. That a shareholder should release himself from liability to pay for his shares by proof that he was misinformed as to a fact by his own agent, or misled as to the effect of certain known facts upon his contract, or was ignorant of the law which prevented any shareholder from being released, or his subscription canceled, without the consent of the other shareholders, would be a most disastrous doctrine. The rule that a mistake of law does not relieve in equity any more than at law is well settled. Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 50 [23 L.ed. 206].

The next and last assignment of error necessary to consider is that this action cannot be maintained by Dickinson as assignee. This argument is based upon the facts that subsequent to the assignment the shareholders, other than himself, by means raised by the issuance of preferred stock, heretofore mentioned, and with borrowed money, compromised the greater part of the debts of the corporation, and that the assignee has suffered them to resume business with the machinery assigned to him, they having given bond for its protection. The assets thus in their hands are probably abundant to pay such creditors as have not yet been settled with. The only effect of this is to strip the assignee of any advantages which creditors might be supposed to have in a suit to compel a shareholder to pay his call, over the same action by the corporation. We have accordingly treated each question just as if it were a controversy between Cartwright and the Grubbs Cracker Company. That Dickinson is entitled to maintain this suit follows from the fact that he has not resigned his trust, and that there are creditors whose claims he must provide for. The claim is an asset in his hands, and it, together with other assets, remains in his control as trustee, and he may and ought to reduce them to money, and pay off remaining creditors, and account for the surplus to the assignors.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Conrad SCHROEDER

v.

Anna M. GALLAND et al., Appts.

(....Pa.....)

A sub-contractor who agrees with the principal contractor, knowing him to be such, to execute a part of the work upon a building which the latter has undertaken to construct, is bound to take notice of the terms of the original contract, and his right to a lien on the building is controlled thereby; hence, if such contract provides that the building shall be delivered free of all liens, he cannot acquire a lien thereon.

(April 21, 1890.)

NOTE.—Mechanic's lien; sub-contractor.

The covenant of a contractor, that he will not suffer or permit any mechanic's lien or liens to be filed, is a waiver of the right to file or cause to be filed a claim for a lien in his own favor. Long v. Caffrey, 98 Pa. 526, followed in Seheid v. Rapp, 121 Pa. 593.

Where one subscriber to the stock of a company having a contract with the company to build an ice-house made a contract with another to build it, the company is the real party to the contract, is bound by it, and subject to a lien therefor, which cannot be defeated on the ground that the work was done by a sub-contractor. McFall v. McKeesport & Y. Ice Co. 123 Pa. 253.

A mechanic's lien by a sub-contractor cannot be filed, where the items furnished within six months were only to supply defects. Women's Homeo- 7 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lackawanna County in favor of plaintiff in an action to enforce an alleged mechanic's lien. Reversed.

At the trial defendants submitted certain requests for instruction, which, together with the answers thereto, are as follows:

"A contractor may contract with the owner of a lot of land to erect a building upon the same and deliver it to the owner free of all liens and incumbrances that may arise under any action of his or her legal representatives under the contract, and having so contracted he cannot file a mechanic's lien."

Answer: "This is not affirmed." [Third assignment of error.]

For a discussion of the systems prevailing in the various States, see Merrigan v. English (Mont.) 5 L. R. A. 837.

Statutes of Montana distinguished.

A sub-contractor has a direct lien, under the Montana laws. Merrigan v. English (Mont.) 5 L. R. A. 837.

His rights are not limited by the rights of the contractor. Ibid.

When seeking to maintain and enforce a lien for materials furnished, he must, at or before the time at which they were furnished, notify the owner of the sum at which they are valued. Whiteside v. Lebocher, 7 Mont. 473.

"The right of a mechanic's lien is founded by law on a contract to build, and a sub-contract is dependent upon the principal one, so that a sub-contractor's right to file a mechanic's lien is limited by the terms of the contract between the builder and the owner."

Answer: "This is true to a certain extent, as to the time and mode of payment, but they cannot, by their contract, deprive the sub-contractor of a right to a lien." [Fourth assignment of error.]

"If the jury believe from the evidence that Conrad Schroeder sub-contracted with Olmstead to furnish a part of the material, to perform a part of the work and labor in the erection and building of Mrs. Galland's house, and that Olmstead had contracted with Mrs. Galland to build the house at a price agreed upon between them, and deliver it over to her free of all liens and incumbrances or any claims whatsoever that might arise under any action of his or her legal representatives under the contract, Schroeder cannot file a mechanic's lien against Mrs. Galland's house for the work and labor done and materials furnished under his contract with Olmstead."

Answer: "This is not affirmed. If an owner making a contract with another to erect a house, provides in his contract that no mechanic's liens shall be filed against it, that is binding upon the person with whom the contract is made, but it is not binding upon a sub-contractor. Parties to the contract may lay down the law between themselves; they cannot repeal the Mechanic's Lien Law as to a sub-contractor." [Fifth assignment of error.]

"Under all the law and the evidence in this case the verdict must be for the defendants."

Answer: "This point is not affirmed." [Sixth assignment of error.]

The facts fully appear in the opinion.

Mears, S. B. Price and Lemuel Amerman, for appellants:

If a contractor agree that no liens shall be filed against a building which he is about to erect, the contract will be enforced, and he will be prevented thereby from filing a lien.

Long v. Caffrey, 98 Pa. 526; Scheid v. Rapp, 121 Pa. 598.

Where there is a special contract with the owner, the party who deals with the contractor must provide for his own security, and cannot rely upon the remedy provided by the Mechanic's Lien Law.

Chouteaus v. Leech, 18 Pa. 224; Loudon Sav. Fund Soc. v. Hagerstown Sav. Bank, 36 Pa. 498.

Where the materials furnished are of the kind that would induce a careful, prudent and skillful man, acquainted with the building, to believe that they could be used in its erection, and if they could in fact be usefully employed in its construction, then the materialman is not bound to inquire into the character of the materials which the contractor had agreed with the owner of the building to use in its construction.

Odd Fellows Hall v. Masser, 24 Pa. 510.

When a contract is made for the erection of a house the materialman has a lien, notwithstanding notice to him from the owner that he must look solely to the contractor for payment.

Hall v. Parker, 94 Pa. 109. See also Cattanch v. Ingersoll, 1 Phila. 286.

An agreement of the contractor with the owner not to make the building liable to liens of others, will not prevent liens from arising in favor of materialmen.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, Schroeder, was a sub-contractor under the principal contractor, Olmstead, for the execution of a part of the work of the construction of a house for the defendant, Galland. In the contract between the owner and the principal contractor it was expressly stipulated that the building should be built, finished and delivered over to the owner, "free of all liens and incumbrances, or any claims whatever that might arise under any action of the party of the second part, or his legal representatives under this contract." And again it is provided that the payments were to be made to the party of the second part "provided the wages of all artisans and laborers and all those employed by, or furnishing materials to, the said party of the second part, on account of this contract, shall have been paid and satisfied;" and further, "In case the party of the second part fails to pay and satisfy all and every legal claim and demand, as aforesaid, against the building, the said party of the first part, if he deems proper so to do, retain from the moneys due and coming to the party of the second part enough to satisfy such claims and demands; and if there be not enough due or coming, then the said second party covenants and agrees to pay the same. Said second party also agrees to pay sub-contractors and parties furnishing materials on account of this contract pro rata at each estimate."

The owner seems to have guarded himself as well as it was possible to do, by these provisions against liens, claims, demands and liabilities of and to any and all other persons than the principal contractor. The stipulation against liens is undoubtedly obligatory upon the principal contractor, and so far as he is concerned no lien could be filed. Long v. Caffrey, 98 Pa. 526; Scheid v. Rapp, 121 Pa. 598.

The controlling question of this case is, Can the sub-contractor file a lien for the work and materials done and furnished by him, notwithstanding the stipulations of the principal contractor? If he can the owner instead of paying $9,000 for the completed house according to the contract will be obliged to pay therefor nearly $11,000. The plaintiff filed his lien as a sub-contractor, under Schroeder, whom he described as contractor and with whom he contracted. He says in his claim of lien: "The name of the person with whom Conrad Schroeder contracted is named Charles Olmstead." He also states that the name of the owner is Anna M. Galland, the wife of B. Galland. He therefore knew that he was dealing and contracting, not with the owner, but with one who was a contractor for the construction of the building. The only connection between the owner and this sub-contractor was through, and by means of, the written contract between the owner and the principal contractor. He could not, in such circumstances, contract with this person without being charged with notice of the contract of the latter with the owner, and, by necessary consequence, with notice of all its terms and stipulations. A sub-contractor for construction is certainly bound to know the kind of building that is to be erected, the materials of which it is to be built, the price to be paid for it and the manner and times of payment. He cannot, under a contract for the erection of a building at a cost of $1,000, furnish work and materials to the amount of $5,000. He cannot furnish wood as material for the erection of a building to be built of marble or stone or bricks. Nor can he furnish unsuitable materials, even of a kind demanded by the contract, and entitle himself to a lien therefor.

In the case of Harlan v. Rand, 27 Pa. 511, we decided that to entitle a materialman, who deals with the contractor, to have his lien, he must furnish materials suitable for the building and apparently adapted to it. There the contractor made a contract with a sub-contractor to furnish a heater of a new construction to heat the building. The sub-contractor employed the plaintiff, who claimed a lien, to do the work. The contract with the sub-contractor stipulated that if the heater did not answer the purpose of heating the building, it was to be removed at his expense. The claimant, who did the work, filed a lien for it and this court held he was bound by the provisions of the contract with his employer, the sub-contractor, though he was no party to it, and rejected his lien. Lowrie, J., in delivering the opinion said: "There are several cases that show that the materialman cannot justly charge the building for all the materials that he may choose to furnish on its credit, without reference to the quantity or quality needed. He must, in his supplies, regard the size and apparent character of the building, and his lien cannot go beyond what these show to be reasonable. Odd Fellows Hall v. Masser, 24 Pa. 510. . . . And no one would think of saying that a materialman shall have a lien for materials furnished for a particular purpose and which are unfit for it. . . . If they are furnished on the order of the owner of the house, of course this rule does not apply; for a man may pledge his own property for any kind of materials. But it is involved in the very fact of furnishing them to a contractor of the building on its credit, that he should know its character, and that they must, at least apparently, be adapted to it."

On another branch of the case the same judge said: "When the owner employs a house builder to erect a house for him, the parties are directly connected by contract, and the lien must be founded on it."

The same thought is expressed and enforced in the recent case of Brown v. Cowan, 110 Pa. 588, 1 Cent. Rep. 623. We there say: "It is the plain and obvious duty of one who deals with an alleged contractor to know the relation which he bears to the owner. Failing in this he furnishes labor or materials at his peril."

Of course it cannot be questioned for a moment that a sub-contractor who undertakes the construction, in whole or in part, of a building, under a contract with the principal contractor, is absolutely bound by all the plans and specifications expressed in the original contract of the owner with the builder. He must conform to the original contract in all matters, and in the minutest detail, precisely as the builder would be obliged to do. It is most obvious that he cannot depart in any respect either from the designs, the dimensions, the materials, the plans, shapes and sizes, that are expressed in the original contract. And the reason is most manifest. He is the representative of the builder. He undertakes to perform the contract of the latter with the owner either in whole or in part and of course he must conform to that contract in every particular. It would be of no use for him to say that he did not know the particulars of that contract; he is bound to know them. It is a legal necessity arising from the fact that he has undertaken to do the work which his principal has engaged to do. He certainly cannot furnish pine wood for interior wood work when the owner's contract with the builder calls for walnut or cherry or ash. He cannot furnish stone when the contract requires marble, or bricks when stone is designated, or one kind of stone when another kind is expressed, or wood instead of bricks. He cannot furnish a building of two stories when three are demanded by the contract, or of six rooms when ten are required. These conclusions are readily appreciated and will be at once conceded. But to go further and into greater detail, it must be equally plain that one who, as a sub-contractor, agrees with the principal contractor to furnish materials only for the building is just as precisely bound as his principal by the stipulations of the original contract. If that contract requires the mantle to be of marble he must make them of marble, and he not only could not acquire a right to a lien if he made them of slate or of wood, but he would not be entitled to any payment whatever from the owner for his work. And vice versa, if they were required to be of wood he could not make them of marble or slate. And so if a carpenter should take a sub-contract for the wood work he could not furnish hemlock flooring when the owner's contract required pine or ash, or doors of pine when doors of walnut were specified. And so of painters and glaziers and plasterers who take sub-contracts for the execution of their several specialties, they are all bound by the owner's con-

to be ignorant of his limitations or to plead such ignorance as an excuse for insufficient performance, and the reason for it all is most manifest. They are bound to do just what their principal was bound to do, because they assumed to perform his contract with the owner, to the extent of their undertaking, and of course they must perform according to his express limitations. In other words they necessarily have notice of the terms and stipulations of his contract with the owner, and that means not a part, but all, of those terms and stipulations. Upon the plainest legal principles applicable in all other cases, they cannot have the benefits of the builder's contract without accepting the conditions upon which those benefits are conferred. If they could, they would defeat the explicit contract of the owner upon a point without which, it may easily be, he would never have consented to it. If the law would tolerate this method of dealing with building contracts, it would only be necessary for the original contractor to sublet his contract by portions to different persons, and the prohibition against liens would be utterly destroyed and a contract would be enforced against the owner to which he never consented.

There is no hardship to sub-contractors in enforcing a provision prohibiting liens against them, because they are bound to know, by necessity, all the terms of the contract made by their principal in any event, and they therefore know of the prohibition. But the owner has no opportunity of protecting himself because he cannot know to what persons the contract or portions of it may be sub-let. He has done all he could by prohibiting liens in plain terms in his written contract, and of that prohibition all sub-contractors are bound to know and may abstain from contracting on such terms if they choose. We know of no good reason for giving such an extraordinary privilege to sub-contractors as the right to repudiate one of the most important terms to which their contracts are subject, or of taking away from an owner the right to insist upon the performance of his contract according to its literal terms.

We take away houses and lands from their owners by means of some secret lien or trust of which they know nothing, by applying the doctrine of constructive notice, and it would be passing strange for us that the right of a sub-contractor for part of a building is of so sacred a character that it shall not be bound by the express limitations of a written contract under which and by force of which his own contract must be performed. His right of lien has no existence at common law or in equity. It is a creature of statute alone, but the statute confers upon him no special prerogative to transcend the most familiar principles of the law and to claim privileges which are denied to all other citizens in the determination of their contract rights.

Let it be granted that a contractor as well as the owner has power to bind the building by a lien for work and materials, we have never yet held that he may confer that right possess the right himself. The question is one of first impression. Heretofore it has never been before us. It is with us now, and we are at liberty to decide it in accordance with our views of right and justice, and with those principles of the interpretation and administration of contracts between citizens which we unflinchingly apply in all other cases.

In an old case decided many years ago by the District Court of Allegheny County (Campbell v. Sease, 1 Phila. 187) the same conclusion we have reached was expressed and applied. The decision is of no binding authority upon this court, but the reasoning of the opinion is of such clearness and force that some of it may well be repeated here. The learned court says: "The owner contracts with the builder to erect a house on certain terms, and the builder makes a sub-contract with a materialman to supply the materials. The chain of relationship consists of two links, the second of which hangs by the first, and will bear no greater weight. The sub-contractor comes in by reason of his direct contract relation to the builder, and the right of lien of the former for his claim is, pro tanto, substitutionary to that of the latter. As against the owner, the terms of the original contract, and as against the builder, the terms of the sub-contract, limit and qualify the lien of the sub-contractor, so as to prevent his claim from abating the terms of either contract. The allowance of any lien at all to a sub-contractor is a special privilege granted only in case of buildings; and it is not unreasonable to require him to look at the principal contract, to ascertain whether it is such as to justify him in becoming a contractor under it. The argument that the law and the principal contract make the builder the agent of the owner proves nothing. Suppose the fact to be so, still his agency is only special, limited by the terms of the contract. He is to employ men to build the house in the manner and on the terms there indicated. For anything beyond that he exceeds his authority, and does not bind his principal."

In the case of Dickinson College v. Church, 1 Watts & S. 483, Mr. Justice Rogers in delivering the opinion of this court said: "It is a great mistake, which cannot be too soon corrected, if any suppose that when a person undertakes to furnish lumber to a contractor on the credit of a building, that he is relieved from inquiring into the nature of the building he trusts, whether it is brick or frame, whether it is a one or three story house, or whether it is large or small; that in short he can furnish materials enough to complete a three-story house of the largest dimensions, when the materials are intended for a house of the most inferior description. The very fact that he credits the building and does not depend altogether on the personal responsibility of the contractor should, it would seem, suggest the propriety of making the necessary inquiries as to the size, materials and nature of the intended erection."

In the State of California it has been held by their court of last resort in two cases that the right of the sub-contractor to lien is controlled

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS

PEOPLE of the State of New York, vs. rel.
William KEMMLER, Appt.,

Charles F. DURSTON, Agent and Warden of Auburn Prison, Resp.

(N. Y.)

1. The Legislature has power to change the manner of inflicting the penalty of death.
2. The testimony of expert or other witnesses is not admissible to show that in carrying out a law enacted by the Legislature some provision of the Constitution may possibly be violated.
3. Whether the use of electricity as an agency for producing death constitutes a more humane method than hanging for executing the judgment of the court in capital cases is a question for the determination of the Legislature. The determination of that question in the affirmative, after careful deliberation, is conclusive upon the courts, and therefore such method, when adopted, cannot be declared a violation of the constitutional provision against cruel and unusual punishment.

(March 21, 1906)

APPEAL by relator from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming an order of the Cayuga County Court dismissing a writ of habeas corpus sued out for the purpose of determining the legality of his detention in custody and remanding him to the custody of respondent. Affirmed.

The case fully appears in the opinion.

Mr. W. Bourke Cockran, with Mr. Charles S. Hatch, for appellant.

Mr. Charles F. Tabor, Atty-Gen., with Messrs. A. P. Rich, Dist. Atty. of Cayuga County, and George T. Quinby, Dist. Atty. of Erie County, for respondent.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The respondent is the agent and warden of the state prison of Auburn, and the relator, being in his custody, applied for a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the cause of detention, which was made returnable by the officer granting it before the County Judge of Cayuga County. The relator, in his petition for the writ, stated that the cause or pretense of the imprisonment complained of was that after his indictment and trial for the crime of murder in the first degree and his conviction thereof in the court of oyer and terminer he was sentenced by that court to undergo a cruel and unusual punishment for that crime, contrary to the Constitution of this State and of the United States, and was threatened with deprivation of life without due process of law by reason of such illegal sentence and judgment of the court. The writ was duly served upon the respondent, who made return thereto that he detained the relator in his custody as agent and warden of the prison by virtue of the judgment of the court of oyer and terminer, held in the County of Erie, whereby the relator was duly convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and also by virtue of a warrant duly delivered to him under the hand and seal of a justice of the supreme court presiding at the said court of oyer and terminer where the relator was convicted, which recited the indictment, trial, conviction and sentence of the relator and directed the respondent to carry the same into effect in these words: "Now, therefore, you are hereby ordered, commanded and required to execute said sentence upon him, the said William Kemmler, otherwise called John Hort, upon some day within the week commencing on Monday, the twenty-fourth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine, and within the walls of Auburn state prison, or within the yard or enclosure adjoining thereto, by then and there causing to pass through the body of him, the said William Kemmler, otherwise called John Hort, a current of electricity of sufficient intensity to cause death, and that the application of such current of electricity be continued until he, the said William Kemmler, otherwise called John Hort, be dead."

This command and direction to the warden was in accordance with the sentence actually passed upon the relator after conviction, in these words: "The sentence of the court is, that within the week commencing on Monday, the twenty-fourth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine, and within the walls of Auburn state prison, or within the yard or enclosure adjoining thereto, the defendant suffer the punishment of death, to be inflicted by the application of electricity, as provided by the Code of Criminal Procedure of the State of New York, and that in the mean time the defendant be removed to, and until the infliction of such punishment be kept in solitary confinement in, said Auburn state prison."

On the return day of the writ, the relator and the respondent appeared by counsel before the county judge, and by agreement of counsel the production of the relator, pursuant to the command of the writ, was waived. Counsel for the relator then offered to prove that the infliction of the penalty named in the sentence, namely, death by the application of electricity, is a cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the Constitution, and cannot therefore be lawfully inflicted. The attorney-general objected, on the ground that the court had no authority to take proof in regard to the constitutionality of the Statute. This objection was overruled by the county judge, and the counsel for the respective parties agreed that a referee be appointed for the purpose of taking the testimony in pursuance of the offer.

In this way a mass of testimony was given upon both sides, certified by the referee to the county judge, and embraced in the extended record before us. The result was, that after a hearing upon the report of the referee, the county judge dismissed the writ, and remanded the relator to the custody of the respondent. When it appeared from the return of the respondent that he detained the relator in custody under and by virtue of the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, wherein the relator was convicted of murder, it was the duty of the county judge to dismiss the writ and remand the relator to the custody of the agent and warden of the prison, unless it could be shown that the court of oyer and terminer was without jurisdiction to pass the sentence which it did. People v. Warden of N. Y. Co. Jail, 100 N. Y. 20, 1 Cent. Rep. 173; People v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559.

It is not denied that the court had such jurisdiction, providing that the Legislature had power under the Constitution to enact chap. 489 of the Laws of 1888, entitled "An Act to Amend §§ 491, 492, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in Relation to the Infliction of the Death Penalty, and to Provide Means for the Infliction of Such Penalty." Prior to the passage of this Statute, the punishment by death in every case was to be inflicted by hanging the convict by the neck until he was dead. This provision of law was changed by the Amendments of the Code above referred to, and now the section (505) reads as follows: "The punishment of death must in every case be inflicted by causing to pass through the body of the convict a current of electricity of sufficient intensity to cause death, and the application of such current must be continued until such convict is dead."

The only question involved in this appeal is whether this enactment is in conflict with the provision of the State Constitution which forbids the infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. Const. art. 1, § 5.

This provision was borrowed from the English Statute, passed in the first year of the reign of William and Mary, being chapter 2 of the Statutes of that year, entitled "An Act Declaring the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and Settling the Succession of the Crown," usually known as the Bill of Rights. It enacts, among other things, that "excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted." When this Statute was made part of the Constitution of the United States, the word "shall" was substituted for the word "ought," and in this form it first appears in the Constitution of this State, adopted in 1846. It is not very clear whether the provision as it stands in our Constitution was intended as an admonition to the Legislature and the judiciary, or as a restraint upon legislation inflicting punishment for criminal offenses. When the Statute referred to was enacted in England, it was not intended as a check upon the power of Parliament to prescribe such punishment for crime as it considered proper. Its enactment did not change any law then existing, nor did it mitigate the harshness of criminal punishments in that country, for more than half a century after it appeared on the statute book, a long catalogue of offenses were punishable by death, many of which were not visited with that extreme penalty before the Bill of Rights was passed. 2 Sharsw. Bl. Com. chap. 83, p. 440.

The history of the times in which this provision assumed the form of a law shows that it was, after all, intended to be little more than a declaration of the rights of the subject. The English people were about to place upon the throne, made vacant by revolution, a foreign prince, whose life had been spent in military pursuits, rather than in the study of constitutional principles and the limitations of power as then understood in the country he was to govern. This was considered a favorable opportunity to enact, in the solemn form of a statute, a declaration of the principles upon which the people desired the government to be conducted. But whatever the purpose of this Statute was in the country where it originated, we think that its presence in the Constitution of this State confers power upon the courts to declare void legislative Acts prescribing punishments for crime, in fact cruel and unusual. This is the power that is invoked against the amendments to the Code of Criminal Procedure above referred to, by the learned counsel for the relator, in an argument addressed to us interesting on account of its great political and scientific research. We entertain no doubt in regard to the power of the Legislature to change the manner of inflicting the penalty of death. The general power of the Legislature over crimes, and its power to define and punish the crime of murder, is not and cannot be disputed. The amendments prescribed no new punishment for this offense. The punishment now, as before, is death. The only change made is in the mode of carrying out the sentence. The infliction of the death penalty in any manner must necessarily be accompanied with what might be considered in this age some degree of cruelty, and it is resorted to only because it is considered necessary for the protection of society. The Act on its face does not provide for any other or additional punishment.

In behalf of the relator this legislation is assailed in no other way than by attempting to show that the new mode of carrying out a death sentence subjects the person convicted to the possible risk of torture and unnecessary pain. This argument would apply with equal force to any untried method of execution, and, when carried to its logical results, would prohibit the enforcement of the death penalty at all. Every Act of the Legislature must be presumed to be in harmony with the fundamental law until the contrary is clearly made to appear. Metropolitan Board of Excise v. Barria, 34 N. Y. 606, 668; People v. Briggs, 50 N. Y. 553, 558; People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 838, 844; People v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50, 54; People v. Gilson, 109 N. Y. 389, 397, 12 Cent. Rep. 616; People v. King, 110 N. Y. 418, 1 L. R. A. 298.

from matters of which a court can take judicial notice, then the Act must stand. The testimony of expert or other witnesses is not admissible to show that in carrying out a law enacted by the Legislature some provision of the Constitution may possibly be violated. People v. Albertson, supra; People v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 582; Re New York Elevated R. Co. 70 N. Y. 827.

If the Act upon its face is not in conflict with the Constitution, then extraneous proof cannot be used to condemn it. The history and origin of the enactment we are now considering may very properly be referred to to test its validity, and ascertain its true intent and proper interpretation. It has been said that courts will place themselves in the situation of the Legislature, and by ascertaining the necessity and probable objects of the passage of a law, give effect to it, if possible, according to the intention of the lawmakers, when that can be done without violating any constitutional provision. People v. Columbia Co. 48 N. Y. 180.

Chapter 352 of the Laws of 1886, entitled "An Act to Authorize the Appointment of a Commission to Investigate and Report to the Legislature the Most Humane and Approved Method of Carrying into Effect the Sentence of Death in Capital Cases," provided for the appointment of a commission consisting of three eminent citizens, who were named therein, and required them to investigate and report to the Legislature on or before the fourth Tuesday of January, 1887, the most humane and practical method known to modern science of carrying into effect the sentence of death in capital cases.

To enable this commission to make its investigation most thorough, the Legislature extended the time for it to report for a year longer by chapter 7 of the Laws of 1887. This commission early in the legislative session of 1888 made its report accompanied with a proposed bill which the Legislature afterwards, and during the same session, enacted, and this is the Statute which is now attacked in behalf of the death with care and caution and unusual deliberation. It would be a strange result, indeed, if it could now be held that its efforts to devise a more humane method of carrying out the sentence of death in capital cases have culminated in the enactment of a law in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments. Whether the use of electricity as an agency for producing death constituted a more humane method of executing the judgment of the court in capital cases, was a question for the determination of the Legislature. It was a question peculiarly within its province, and the means at its command for ascertaining whether such a mode of producing death involved cruelty, within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition, were certainly as satisfactory and reliable as any that are consistent with the limited functions of an appellate court. The determination of the Legislature of this question is conclusive upon this court. The Amendment to the Code of Criminal Procedure changing the mode of inflicting the death penalty does not upon its face, nor in its general purpose and intent, violate any provision of the Constitution. The testimony taken by the referee, while not available to impeach the validity of the legislation, may, we think, be regarded as a valuable collection of facts and opinions touching the use of electricity as a means of producing death, and for that reason as part of the argument for the relator, but nothing more.

We have examined this testimony and can find but little in it to warrant the belief that this new mode of execution is cruel, within the meaning of the Constitution, though it is certainly unusual. On the contrary, we agree with the court below that it removes every reasonable doubt that the application of electricity to the vital parts of the human body, under such conditions, and in the manner contemplated by the Statute, must result in instantaneous, and consequently in painless, death.

1. Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The people bring their suit under Act No. 165, Laws 1889, to recover a penalty for the failure of the defendant to provide an open, unobstructed residence crossing, suitably guarded, in front of the residence buildings of one Henry Fall, in the Township of Bloomfield, Oakland County. Judgment was rendered against the defendant for $140, and it appeals. The following facts were stipulated, and constitute all the evidence that was introduced upon the trial, viz.:

"(1) That the defendant is a corporation, and owns and operates a railroad between the City of Detroit and the City of Grand Haven, in the State of Michigan, which runs through the Township of Bloomfield, in the County of Oakland, in said State. (2) That at a point on defendant's road about one mile northerly of the Village of Birmingham, in said County of Oakland, one Henry Fall owns a farm on the northerly side of said road, and has his residence there adjacent to the said railroad, and the railroad is between his residence and the usually traveled public highway, and immediately adjacent to said road, and is parallel to said road. (3) That said Henry Fall has a farm crossing, which was provided and is maintained by the defendant Company, with suitable openings and gates thereto, affording him ingress and egress across defendant's road, between his residence and the highway. (4) That the defendant and said Henry Fall derived title to their said real properties independently from the same common remote grantor, the said Fall having purchased since defendant's right of way was obtained and its road constructed. (5) That the defendant Company has been in possession of the right of way through said Township of Bloomfield, adjacent to said Fall's farm and residence, and in operation of its railroad, for more than forty years last past. (6) That the commissioner of railroads, the Honorable John T. Rich, on the 16th day of November, A. D. 1889, made an examination, finding and order on complaint of said Fall, all substantially as alleged in the declaration, a copy of which order was duly served upon the defendant Company as alleged, requiring it, in pursuance of the provisions of § 15, art. 4, of Act No. 198, Sess. Laws 1873, as amended by Act No. 165, Sess. Laws 1889, within ten days from said date, to construct an open, unobstructed residence crossing, suitably guarded, substantially as provided for highway and street crossings, and thereafter to efficiently maintain the same, so as to give Henry Fall a near, safe and convenient outlet or passageway from his residence or real property over defendant's track to the highway running in front of the same, to wit, at the place of residence of said Henry Fall, on the line of defendant's railway as aforesaid. (7) That defendant has neglected and refused, and still neglects and refuses, to comply with such order, substantially as alleged in plaintiff's declaration."

That portion of Act No. 165, above mentioned, imposing upon railroad companies the duty to provide and maintain these crossings, reads as follows:

"And in cases where a railroad is immediately adjacent to or laid upon a highway, open, unobstructed residence crossings, suitably guarded, substantially as are provided for highway and street crossings, shall be provided and maintained by the railroad corporation operating said railroad, provided, the same shall be so ordered by the railroad commissioner."

The defendant contends that this provision infringes section 14, art. 18, of the Constitution of Michigan, which provides that "the property of no person shall be taken for public use without just compensation therefor."

The argument for plaintiff is: (1) It is an exercise of the general police power over railroads. (2) It is an exercise of the police power regulating the special duties imposed upon railroad companies. It is apparent that this provision of the Statute, enacted in 1889, imposes additional burdens and expense upon railroad companies. It requires them to construct and maintain residence crossings at their own expense, in addition to highway and farm crossings. Except as imposed by statute, no obligation exists on the part of a railroad company to give a right of way over its road to private individuals. While it is a quasi public corporation, still, in the holding and use of its land, it is entitled to the same protection as are natural persons.

The following propositions can be regarded as well settled:

1. The police power of the State over railroads includes all those regulations which are necessary for the safety and protection of persons and property in transit over them, or crossing them upon the public highways. The State may therefore require the use of air-brakes, the erection of fences and cattle-guards, the stopping of trains at the crossings of other railroads, the use of bells and whistles, and many other things which will readily suggest themselves. This principle is commended by good sense, and is too well established to require the citation of authorities.

2. The power to require railroads to erect and maintain farm crossings has been the policy of this State from the beginning. Comp. Laws 1857, § 1987.

The original charters of the Detroit & Pontiac Railroad Company, and of the Oakland & Ottawa Railroad Company, to which the defendant succeeded, require it. Nearly, if not all, the railroad companies of Michigan have acquired their rights of way under statutes containing this provision. They have condemned lands and paid the owners compensation with this in view. There has therefore been no hardship or injustice in these requirements, nor in compelling the companies to fulfill them. So far as I have investigated, our sister States have similar statutes, and their constitutionality has been generally sustained as within the police power lodged in the State.

3. Municipal authorities, although expressly authorized by statute, cannot lay out a highway across the road-bed of a railroad, and compel the erection and maintenance of cattle-guards, etc., without compensation. The Statute conferring this authority was held to be repugnant to the Constitution of Michigan, and void. People v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 52 Mich. 277; Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Hough, 61 Mich. 507; Grand Rapids v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 58 Mich. 641.

4. The land of a railroad company can no more be taken for the use, benefit or convenience of an individual than can the property of a natural person. This principle is held applicable to the case of one railroad crossing the track and road-bed of another railroad. Grand Rapids, N. & L. S. R. Co. v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 85 Mich. 265.

Such benefit and convenience are not enough. Something must be shown to fairly bring the case within the general police power which the State may exercise over railroads. Now, an examination of the record shows that Fall applied for an "open, unobstructed residence crossing, suitably guarded, as required by section 15 of said Act." It is not an application for improving, changing or constructing the farm crossing, referred to in paragraph 3 of the stipulated facts. That crossing therefore has no bearing upon the controversy. We pass no opinion upon the duty of defendant to change this farm crossing so as to conform to the requirements of the Statute in that regard. That question is not in the case. Nothing in the record shows whether the residence crossing was located in the same place as the farm crossing or not. We must therefore consider this as an application de novo, and the sole question in the case to be whether a railroad company can be compelled to make a crossing over its track from a highway to a person's residence, where none existed before. The an-verdict of a jury, there is evidence to support it. Fall purchased the premises with the situation just as it is now, and as it has been for many years, possibly forty, the length of time that the defendant's railroad has been built. The record is silent as to whether he has any other access to a highway, or as to the character and extent of his business, except that he owns a farm. But whether it is a fruit, grain or stock farm; whether it contains one acre or more; whether he requires the crossing to drive stock over; or whether he requires it for any other purpose, except for the passage of himself and family,—we are not informed. The irresistible conclusion from the whole record is that Fall's application and the order of the commissioner were made with sole reference to his (Fall's) benefit and convenience. It is apparent that every open crossing into the public highway across a railroad track increases, rather than diminishes, the danger of travel, by giving animals the opportunity to get upon the track in front of passing trains. These residence crossings cannot, therefore, be justified on the ground of protection and safety to passengers and property. The Statute applies to all residence buildings.

If plaintiff's contention be correct, then a land owner, across whose land a railroad has been constructed, and who has been amply compensated in damages, may erect twenty or more residence buildings on the land fronting the railroad and the highway, sell them, together with the lands on which they are situated, and compel the railroad company to construct and maintain as many residence crossings. Such action would seriously increase the dangers of travel, and impose heavy additional burdens upon railroads. If it is the duty of the State to provide access for every citizen to the public highway, so that he may obey the decree of the courts, pay his taxes, vote, send his children to school and exercise all the prerogatives of citizenship, the State cannot perform this duty by taking the property of one citizen, and giving it to another, without compensation.

We therefore conclude (1) that the Act above mentioned, in so far as it provides for taking the property of a railroad company for public use without compensation, is unconstitutional and void; (2) railroad companies cannot be compelled to erect and maintain residence crossings at their own expense, for the use and benefit of individuals, when no statute requiring them existed at the time of the construction of the road; (3) the facts in this case do not bring it within the power of police regulation.

way, unobstructed residence crossings, suitably guarded, substantially as are provided for highway and street crossings, shall be provided and maintained by the railroad corporation operating said railroad; provided, the same shall be so ordered by the railroad commissioner." I think this provision of the Act is valid, as a proper exercise of the police power of the State and its control over railroads, as applied to all such roads built after its passage; and perhaps it might not be unconstitutional as applied to cases of railroads built and operated before this Act took effect, when the residence building was upon the premises before the Railroad Company ran its road between it and the highway.

But in this case it appears that the Railroad Company and the residence owner acquired title from the same grantor, and that the Railroad Company got its title first. Whether the Company has a title in fee or only a right of way does not appear, and, if a right of way, whether its title was acquired by condemnation or purchase. Under these circumstances, I concur in the opinion that Mr. Fall, the residence owner, cannot, under this Act, compel the defendant to open and maintain at its own expense the crossing provided for in this Act. The law cannot be given such a retroactive effect as to destroy property rights in real estate, vested for more than forty years in the defendant, without compensation, and throw additional burdens for all time upon such real estate,—burdens not contemplated nor necessary for any reason when such property was acquired. This being a penal action, it must be considered under the finding that the defendant obtained its title before Mr. Fall purchased his farm, and that both hold their lands by deeds from a common grantor; that the residence was not built at the time the railroad was, or, if built, that the owner of it, this common grantor, received at that time adequate compensation for the inconveniences resulting from the running of the railroad between the house and the highway. For this reason I agree in the result of this case as announced by my brethren.

But I am satisfied that a railroad company does not stand, as to the exercise of state control, upon the same footing as private persons, and that its property can be subjected to burdens not imposed on the mere owners of private property, used purely and exclusively for private interests and purposes, for the reason that all property devoted to public uses takes on quasi public qualities, and is therefore subject to limitations on such use by the State, and to legislative control, when such control seems necessary to the Legislature, and is reasonable; and of the necessity of such control the Legislature is the sole judge, and courts can only inquire into the reasonableness of the methods of such control. A railroad may be required to fence its tracks and construct cattle-guards and to construct farm crossings. The railroads of this State have always been subject to regulations of this kind imposed upon them by the State, and no one has doubted the right of the Legislature to regulate and control them in this respect. And I am not prepared to say that this Act could not reach back, and be operative and valid, in a case where the dwelling-house was upon the land at the time the road was built, and the owner of the land acquired his title first, and the company obtained its right of way by condemnation, and the residence owner has no access to any other highway. In other words, I am satisfied of the authority of the Legislature, under the general police power of the State, to make the regulation as to residence crossings found in this Act, and that it is a reasonable one, as applied to cases arising after the Act became a law. Whether or not it can be applied to cases where the conditions of the premises, railroad and highway are the same as they were before the passage of the Act, in my opinion depends upon the reasonableness of the regulation as applied to each particular case. While conceding the potency of the police power of the State, I do not think it omnipotent; and as said before, in Whitney v. Grand Rapids Twp. (Mich.), 39 N. W. Rep. 42, the Legislature cannot arbitrarily and without reason, and in defiance of right, pass any statute it may see fit under this power. This Statute, while reasonable and proper and valid as to all conditions and circumstances of residence crossings coming within its provisions hereafter, cannot be arbitrarily, unreasonably and in defiance of right applied to the case in hand.

A dispute as to the ownership of a strip of land, claimed by each party in fee simple, under a deed which includes it, cannot be settled by arbitration under How. Stat., § 8475, which allows arbitration to settle boundaries of lands, but not to determine a claim to any estate in fee or for life.

(February 20, 1890.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment denying a motion to set aside the award of arbitrators appointed to settle a dispute as to the proper position of a boundary fence. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Powell & Dorland, for plaintiff, appellant:

In their decision the arbitrators have made the title to plaintiff's land variant from the paper title, which it was not in their province to do.

Gallagher v. Kern, 81 Mich. 138; How. Stat. § 8475.

The submission is relative to the boundary, while the award is as to ownership in fee. An award upon matters not submitted is void.

Messrs. Stewart & Galloway for defendants, appellees.

Morse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

March 2, 1887, the plaintiff entered into an agreement in writing with defendants to settle their difficulties as to whether a certain fence between them, and then marking the boundary line, was in its proper position, the defendant's claiming, as set forth in the agreement to arbitrate, that the fence stands in its proper place to mark the boundary line, and the plaintiff claiming that said fence is "considerably west of its proper location."

The writing states further: "It is hereby agreed, by and between said party of the first part (Lang), and the said parties of the second part (Balliotte and Dronillard), to submit the determination of the boundary between the premises of the said party of the first part and those of said parties of the second part under the Statutes in such cases made and provided (being chap. 292 of Howell's Compilation) to two arbitrators," giving the two selected, Frederick W. Kurth and Charles C. Stewart, the right to call in a third person if they failed to agree. The parties also covenanted not to sue each other, or to allow any suit to be brought concerning this boundary line, and that they would each faithfully obey and carry out the decision of the said arbitrators, and that, if either party failed to do this, the other could compel him to do so in the Wayne Circuit Court.

The two arbitrators met, the matter was submitted to them, and they made a written finding and determination March 30, 1887, which on the 14th day of April, same year, was filed with the clerk of the Wayne Circuit Court, and notice of such filing duly served upon Lang. Lang thereupon moved the circuit court to set the award aside, on the ground that the arbitrators had exceeded their powers. This motion was denied, and judgment entered upon such award in favor of the defendants. Plaintiff comes here upon writ of error. The arbitrators decided that "the fence, as it now stands, marks the proper boundary between the lands of the said Jacob Lang, party of the first part, and those of the said Moses Balliotte and Joseph Dronillard, parties of the second part, and that the fence in the rear shall be built on the line indicated by the fence now standing between the lands of said first party, and those of said parties of the second part in front." But it appears from their own award that they arrived at this decision by examining into the title of the parties to the land, and by determining that the deed of Lang was wrong in its description, and should be corrected. They found: First, That the deeds under which Lang occupied and held his land did, in terms, convey to him 104 feet beyond the fence mentioned in the submission. Second, That Lang's grantor did not own this 108 feet when he deeded to Lang, and never was the owner of the same. Therefore the land was not conveyed. Third, That Moses Balliotte became the owner of this 108 feet, November 7, 1815, by a deed from Hyacinth Balliotte and wife; that prior to this Hyacinth Balliotte was the owner of this 108 feet, and also of the land now occupied by Lang, and that he never made any other conveyance of the 104 feet, except this one to Moses Balliotte; that he deeded the land occupied by Lang, November 22, 1853, to Antoine Renu, who deeded the same to Alexis M. Balliotte by two deeds, one dated December 15, 1858, and the other December 10, 1859, neither of which deeds purported to convey this 108 feet. They therefore decide that the deeds from Alexis M. Balliotte to Peter Jager, and the deed from Jager to Lang, which purport to convey the 108 feet, should read (inserting description so as not to contain this 108 feet; and as to this strip of 108 feet, which said Jager assumed to convey to Lang, "the said Lang's proper remedy is by suit against the said Jager for breach of warranty, unless he has lost the same through the Statute of Limitations."

It will be seen that the arbitrators did not pass upon the boundary line between two land holders, holding titles that did not conflict as to description, but they examined and passed upon the respective titles of the parties in fee, both of whom were claiming under their deeds the title in fee to this same strip of land. In order to do this, they had to determine, and did determine, that the deeds under which Lang claimed title to this strip did not convey the land for want of title in his grantor, although in express terms the strip was conveyed by them, and passed in fee to Lang. The contest turns out not to be over a mere boundary line between adjoining properties, but the dispute to be settled is the ownership of a strip of land 108 feet wide, claimed by both parties in fee simple. This contest or dispute cannot be settled by arbitration, under the Statute. Section 8475, How. Stat., provides that "no such submission shall be made respecting the claim of any person to any estate, in fee or for life, in real estate, but any claim to an interest for a term of years, or for one year or less, in real estate, and controversies respecting the partition of lands between joint tenants or tenants in common, or concerning the boundaries of lands, or concerning the administration of dower, may be so submitted to arbitration."

The effect of the finding of the arbitrators was to establish the ownership of this strip in the defendants, or one of them, who it was claimed by plaintiff, whose deed upon its face included it. This was beyond their jurisdiction, and they therefore exceeded their powers under the Statute. Gallagher v. Kern, 81 Mich. 188.

The motion to set aside the award should have been granted, and the judgment entered thereon must be vacated and set aside, with costs of both courts to the plaintiff.

Champlin, C. J., and Campbell and Grant, J. J., concurred; Long, J., did not sit.

1. The right of a riparian proprietor upon navigable waters to improve, reclaim and occupy the submerged lands out to the point of navigability, although originally incident to the riparian estate, may be separated therefrom, and be transferred to and enjoyed by persons having no interest in the original riparian estate, overruling Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 38 Minn. 406.
2. A condemnation by a railroad corporation of the upland abutting upon the water,—Held, to embrace also the incidental riparian right of improvement and occupancy of the submerged lands, although no specific mention is made of riparian rights.
3. The specific mention and including in the same petition of riparian rights in respect to other lands belonging to other persons,—Held, not to affect this construction of the petition and proceedings in respect to the land in question.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County overruling its motion for a new trial of an action brought to enjoin it from constructing its road over land covered by the waters of the Bay of St. Louis the right to use which was alleged to belong to plaintiffs, in which judgment had been rendered in their favor. Reversed.

In 1866 the Lake Superior & Mississippi Railroad Company, to whose rights this defendant succeeded, commenced proceedings in the County of St. Louis to condemn for its use for railroad purposes lands in that county, some of them lying near to or touching upon the Bay of St. Louis, or on Superior Bay, or on Lake Superior. The petition by which the proceedings were instituted described the land more particularly involved here by describing certain lines, and then continuing: "Including all the premises between the lines so described and the said Bay of St. Louis," so that the land thus described abuts on the bay. The description makes no mention of riparian rights. The petition described thirty-five distinct tracts of land, parts of which were proposed to be taken, in three of which descriptions of lands to be taken were these or equivalent words: "Including all riparian rights and privileges." The award of the commissioners followed the petition in this respect. The condemnation proceedings were carried to a close by the assessment of damages for the taking and payment thereof. Opposite the land thus taken, and involved therein, between the water line of the bay and the point of navigability, is shallow water for a distance of several hundred feet into the bay. In this space of shallow water, and in front of and about sixty feet from the water line, the defendant has commenced the construction of a railroad track, driving piles for that purpose. The plaintiffs, claiming through conveyance from the owner at the time the petition for condemnation was filed, bring this action to enjoin the defendant from constructing its railroad in said shallow water. No question is made as to the validity of the condemnation proceedings.

The court handed down a decision on June 10, 1889, in which it held that riparian rights exist only as incident to the abutting land, and cannot be so severed therefrom as to be rights in gross not appurtenant to any land in connection with which they may be used and enjoyed; and that therefore when the Railroad Company condemned for its use the land abutting on the bay, it acquired the riparian rights belonging to it, although the petition for condemnation made no express mention of such rights.

Respondents thereupon filed a petition for a reargument, which was granted.

Messrs. Ensign, Cash & Williams, for appellant:

Riparian rights are a part of the bank and cannot be severed from it; they are mere rights incident to the bank and cannot exist in gross. So that if there be an attempt to reserve or except riparian rights, they would nevertheless pass by a conveyance of the bank.

These rights, as the term would indicate, are such as pertain to the shore, the ripa, out of which they spring and in connection with which they exist. They depend upon the ownership of the land to which they attach, and not upon the ownership of the submerged lands, at least in States like Minnesota, where the courts hold that submerged land is owned by the State or sovereign in its sovereign capacity, but that the shore owner has certain valuable rights therein by virtue of the ownership of the shore, and to be used in connection therewith.

The right to wharf out to navigable waters was always considered a natural right, or at least a "natural equity" belonging to the bank, to be exercised by him who was entitled to the use and enjoyment of the bank, and the same theory as to the connection of the right with the bank obtained in regard to "making land" by filling out from the bank.

It would lead to singular and oppressive results to hold that without the consent of a property holder a railroad company could, even by expressly claiming and asking for them, acquire riparian rights by condemnation. They are not rights which are necessary to the carrying on of railroad business.

Rensselaer & S. R. Co. v. Davis, 48 N. Y. 187.

By the rules of the common law, the owner of land lying along the shore of a navigable river is entitled to no right either in the shore or waters as incident to his ownership, except the contingent ones of alluvion and reliction. The right of access does not exist.

In this country obstructions by individuals in front of riparian land seem to have been, with substantial uniformity, redressed upon the theory that the wrongful act, although an injury to the public right of navigation, entailed special damage upon the owner of the bank, for which he was entitled to redress; and no resort has been made to the theory of a private right of access in such owner.

Brayton v. Fall River, 113 Mass. 218; Gould, Waters, § 120, note 2, and many cases cited.

It is inadmissible to infer that all riparian rights are separable from the bank, or all inseparable, merely because one of them is found to be so. If this is not true, then the separableness of all of them was settled many generations since by the cases adjudging the separableness of the right of fishery.

Dickinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

After the filing of our decision in this case (Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 42 N. W. Rep. 596) a re-argument was ordered, upon the application of the respondents, it being considered that great public interests were involved which deserved further consideration by the court, with the aid which further research and argument might afford. The principal question to which such re argument was directed was whether the riparian rights, which the owner of land abutting upon navigable waters enjoys in the submerged lands between the outer boundary of his ownership in fee and the point of navigability, may be alienated or be severed from the riparian land, so as to exist as rights or property in gross. In our former decision in this case we declared such rights to be incapable of separate existence, and upon that proposition the decision rested. In the re-argument of this question the principles of the law and the authorities which could be deemed in any way to bear upon it have been exhaustively and ably presented by learned counsel upon both sides, and, although this principle had been understood to have been settled in Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 38 Minn. 406, we have, in view of the importance of the subject, entered into a full examination and reconsideration of it. We have been thus led to the conclusion that the proposition that the riparian proprietor's peculiar right of occupancy and use of lands beyond the boundary of his ownership in fee are inalienable and incapable of existence, apart from the right of occupancy and use of the adjacent bank, should not be adhered to.

While our former decisions were deemed to be in strict accordance with legal principles, and to follow logically from the fact that the riparian rights came into existence as incidents of the proprietorship of the adjacent shore, we are satisfied that we did not sufficiently consider, in their bearing upon the question, the peculiar nature, extent and relation of the private and public rights, respectively, in the lands lying between the boundary of the riparian owners' fee and the point of navigability, and that undue importance was given to the fact that these riparian rights have their origin in the relation of the riparian lands to the water, and are properly incident or appurtenant to the riparian lands. As we proceed now to notice the nature and extent of certain rights growing out of riparian proprietorship, we desire that attention should be given to the facts that those rights partake largely of the ordinary qualities of private property, which is in general divisible and transferable by the proprietor; that they are recognized as valuable property rights in the law; that they are of such a nature that they may be enjoyed separate from the adjacent land to which they were originally appurtenant; and to the absence of substantial reasons, so far as the nature of these rights are concerned, why they may not exist independently of the adjacent riparian estate. We do not affirm that all riparian rights are thus severable. Some, from the very nature of things, may be incapable of separate existence. In this State the title of the proprietor of lands abutting upon navigable waters extends to low-water mark; the bed of the stream, or body of water, below low-water mark being held by the State, not in the sense of ordinary absolute proprietorship, but in its sovereign governmental capacity, for common public use. Union Depot S. R. & Transfer Co. v. Brunswick, 31 Minn. 207, and cases cited.

The estate or interest of the riparian owner in the bed of the stream above low-water mark stricted only by that paramount public right, the riparian owner enjoys valuable proprietary privileges, among which we shall consider particularly the right to the use of the land itself for private purposes. A considerable extent of the shores, not only along tide waters of the ocean coasts, but on our great inland waters, are of such a nature, out to and even beyond low-water mark, as to be in general unavailable by the public for the purpose of navigation, and must remain forever waste and useless lands, unless reclaimed by artificial means from the shallow water covering them, or unless otherwise improved. It is established beyond question in this State, and in other States as well, that the proprietor of the riparian lands may make such improvements. Subject only to the limitation that he shall not interfere with the public right of navigation, he has the unquestionable and exclusive right to construct and maintain suitable landings, piers and wharves into the water, and up to the point of navigability, for his own private use and benefit. Hippe v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co. 23 Minn. 18; Brisbane v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. Id. 114; Merrill v. St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. 26 Minn. 223; State v. Minneapolis Mill Co. 26 Minn. 220; Curis v. Stillwater S. R. & Transfer Co. 28 Minn. 373; Union Depot, S. R. & Transfer Co. v. Brunswick, 31 Minn. 207; Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 34 Minn. 406; Dutton v. Strong, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 23 [17 L. ed. 29]; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 407 [19 L. ed. 984].

And it is obviously immaterial, if the public interests be not prejudiced, whether the submerged land be covered with wharves of timber or stone, or be reclaimed from the water by filling in with earth so that it becomes dry land. The land may be so reclaimed. Union Depot, S. R. & Transfer Co. v. Brunswick, 31 Minn. 207; Clement v. Burns, 43 N. H. 600; Hell v. Uough, 20 N. J. L. 624; Providence Steam-Engine Co. v. Providence & S. Steamship Co. 13 R. I. 346, 363.

As the right of private use and enjoyment of the improved or reclaimed premises will continue so long, at least, as it does not interfere with the limited and defined public interests, it is obvious that, in general, it may continue forever.

This private right of use and enjoyment is not, we think, limited to purposes connected with the actual use of the navigable water, but may extend to any purpose not inconsistent with the public right. Hippe v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co. 23 Minn. 18; Brisbane v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. Id. 114; Parker v. West Coast Lumbering Co. 17 Or. 510, 5 L. R. A. 61.

As was said in Merrill v. St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. 26 Minn. 223, 228, referring to the decision in Dutton v. Strong, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 23 [17 L. ed. 29]: "The right to encroach upon the shallow water of the lake, by an exclusive appropriation even of the underlying soil, must rest upon the proposition that the riparian owner may make any use of the lake or river opposite his land not inconsistent with the public right." The following language of the Merrill Case, just cited, although worded with reference to the riparian right to use possession by the public right; and the private right exists up to the point beyond which it would be inconsistent with the public right." No one but the riparian proprietor has the right to improve and occupy such premises for private purposes, and it does not concern other persons how or for what particular purposes the reclaimed lands may be used, so long as there is no violation of the maxim, sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. It is for the interest of the State that such lands, not available for the public purposes for which alone the State exercises authority over them, shall be improved and used for profitable enterprises, rather than that they lie forever waste and unproductive. And the State, while recognizing the ancient riparian right of occupancy, has not assumed to prescribe or to limit the purposes or manner of its enjoyment. That seems to have always been left to the discretion of the person in whom the right is exclusive, and the decided cases afford many illustrations of uses in no way connected with the purpose of navigation.

This right of the riparian proprietor, even before it has been in any manner exercised by reclaiming or improving the premises,—the right itself to reclaim, improve or occupy,—is a property right, vested in him, recognized and protected in the law as property. He cannot be deprived of it without due process of law. It cannot be taken from him, and devoted to public use, without compensation. Brisbane v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 23 Minn. 114; Curis v. Stillwater S. R. & Transfer Co. 28 Minn. 373; Union Depot, S. R. & Transfer Co. v. Brunswick, 31 Minn. 207; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 407 [19 L. ed. 984]; Hell v. Uough, 20 N. J. L. 624; Delaplaine v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 43 Wis. 214; Lyon v. Fishmonsters Co. L. R. 1 App. Cas. 663.

Such property is subject to the law of eminent domain. A railroad company, locating its line of road over such submerged lands, might acquire, by condemnation proceedings, and the payment of compensation, the necessary right of way, devastating the riparian owner of so much of his property. But cannot the riparian proprietor voluntarily convey, for an agreed compensation, what the company could thus take from him by legal proceedings in extremis? If he were to convey by deed the right to occupy exclusively for railroad purposes the premises in front of the riparian lands, would not the company acquire a right to occupy and enjoy the use of the premises, although it took no interest in the upland estate?

These peculiar property rights of the riparian owner may constitute, estimated in connection with the riparian land, the chief value of the premises. It may even be that the whole value of such real property consists in the right to improve and occupy the submerged lands for private purposes. The extent of the riparian right in this respect is not measured by the value of the upland, nor by the distance to which the owner's estate may extend inland from the shore. The barest strip of upland, though wholly valueless and useless in itself, justifies the owner in the exercise and enjoyment of the privileges of riparian proprietorship to the fullest extent.

If it be true, as we have said, that the riparian proprietor may improve and occupy such premises in any manner not inconsistent with the public rights, it follows that, although the origin of this peculiar private right is referable to an adjacent riparian estate to which it was originally incident or appurtenant, still its nature and qualities are not in themselves such as to forbid its alienation, its separation from the riparian estate, and its enjoyment by others than the occupants of the upland. Its enjoyment need not be in aid of or associated with the use to which the upland is devoted, or for the benefit of the upland as such. Thus it is supposed that one acquiring a mere right of way for the purpose of access over the upland to the shore may acquire the riparian owner's rights to improve and occupy the waste land beyond. New Haven Steamboat Co. v. Sargent, 50 Conn. 199.

The upland may be used, and be useful, only for purposes to which the use of the adjacent submerged lands, even after reclamation, would be in no manner accessory. The upland may be owned and used exclusively for the purposes of a residence, a church, a hospital, a bank or for any purpose wholly unconnected with the advantages incident to the adjacency of navigable water, or of the intervening waste land; and yet the proprietor might undoubtedly erect a wharf or fill in solid earth, and allow others to use the wharf or reclaimed land. Nor would his right to allow others to use the wharf or made land, or the right of others to use it with his consent, depend upon there being also a license of access to such premises over the abutting upland. We suppose that the land owner might grant to one having no riparian possession in the vicinity the right to use his wharf, or the improved or reclaimed shore lands, for any purpose, whether connected with navigation or not, just as the owner himself might do. No individual whose rights were not prejudiced could complain; and so long as the public rights are not interfered with the State is not interested to oppose such use, but rather is interested to encourage and sanction it, without regard to the fact whether or not the use be associated with the use of the upland.

It has been suggested in some cases that even though such rights cannot be wholly disconnected from riparian lands, and be enjoyed in gross, yet if the person to whom the rights of the riparian proprietor have been relinquished has access to the premises, over the next adjacent estate abutting upon the shore, he may enjoy such rights, although he has no interest in the estate to which they were previously incident (see New Haven Steamboat Co. v. Sargent, 50 Conn. 199), and this is spoken of as being possible in Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 88 Minn. 406.

But this would seem to be inconsistent with the doctrine that such rights are not severable from the riparian estate to which they are by nature appurtenant. The whole reason supporting that doctrine is the technical reason that the rights are merely incident and appurtenant to the abutting riparian land. They were not originally incident to other estates than those adjacent to and in front of which only these privileges might be exercised. The owner of a riparian estate had no peculiar privileges in the submerged land lying in front of the next adjacent estate. If it be conceded that these rights may be separated from the apparent estate, and be enjoyed by the owner of the next estate abutting upon the shore, there is no room for further contention. If such separation is possible, it matters not whether the means of access and opportunities for enjoyment be through the next estate abutting upon the shore, or the next, or by means of a public highway leading to or past the premises in question, or by the navigable water, or in any other manner. Any person who may acquire from the riparian owner his right to improve and occupy such premises may always have access to them by means of the navigable water,—a common highway. He may acquire other means of access. We think that there is nothing in the matter of access which forbids the existence of these rights separate from the abutting estate. In some jurisdictions it is considered that the adjacent riparian owner actually acquires title to the lands improved and reclaimed from the water, although the title was before in the State in actual proprietorship (as in New Jersey); and that he may then convey the reclaimed premises to persons having no interest in the upland. New Jersey Zinc & Iron Co. v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 44 N. J. Eq. 396, 1 L. R. A. 123, 18 Cent. Rep. 842; Bell v. Gough, 23 N. J. L. 624; Goodell v. Lawson, 42 Md. 348, 362; Nichols v. Lewis, 15 Conn. 187; Clement v. Burns, 48 N. H. 609.

We do not wish to be understood as assenting to the proposition that the title of the State may be thus transferred by acts of the riparian proprietor which the State has no particular reason at the time for opposing. It may be doubtful whether the title does not remain unchanged, and whether if, in the future, it should become necessary for the State to broaden the navigable channel so as to embrace the reclaimed land, it would not have the right to do so. However that may be, we deem these decisions to lend some support to the doctrine that the riparian right to fill and reclaim and use the submerged lands for his own private purposes is not necessarily so annexed to his proprietorship of the upland that it cannot be severed. If the right to occupy and use the premises is transferable after they have been improved by the exercise of the legal rights of the riparian proprietor, we see no sufficient reason why his legal right to improve and occupy and use the premises should not also be transferable. If it be said that in the one case he has the legal title, and in the other he only has the valuable right of occupancy and improvement, with the power thereby to acquire the legal title, it may be answered that such rights are themselves ordinarily a proper subject of transfer. It is remarkable that so few authorities are to be found directly deciding the question of the severability of such riparian rights. The question was directly decided in Simons v. French, 25 Conn. 346, it being held that the right of the riparian proprietor to wharf out to navigable water, over the flats (the fee of which was in the State for the purposes of navigation) was not inseparably incident to the upland estate, but was subject to conveyance or reservation by itself.

It is claimed that Simons v. French was overruled or modified in New Haven Steamboat Co. v. Sargent, 50 Conn. 199. We do not understand the latter decision to have such an effect. The court was careful to declare that its decision was based upon the peculiar circumstances of that case, and, while there is language suggesting a doubt as to Simons v. French, in other parts of the opinion the essential doctrine of that case seems to be reaffirmed. To the same effect as Simons v. French is Barker v. West Coast Packing Co. 17 Or. 510, 5 L. R. A. 61.

In Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497 [19 L. ed. 984], the owner of a lot on a navigable river (Shepardson), who had begun to build a wharf in front of it into the river, conveyed to Yates the interest he had in the wharf, and in front of the lot to the center of the river, with the right of docking out and making a water front on the river. Yates built the wharf. His right to maintain it came in question in this action against the city. His right was sustained although without any discussion of the question of severability. The court said: "We are of opinion that Shepardson, as riparian owner of a lot bounded by a navigable stream, had a right to erect this wharf, and Yates, the appellant, whether he be regarded as purchaser or as licensee, has the same right."

The court seems to have regarded it as immaterial whether Yates' grantor owned the fee beyond the shore line or not. It would seem that Yates had probably a way of access to the premises covered by the wharf by means of a street leading down past the lot to the water, but we do not regard this as of controlling importance. See also Bowman v. Wathen, 2 McLean, 876.

In Massachusetts the fee of the riparian owner extends to low-water mark, not exceeding one hundred rods beyond high-water mark; but, it is held subject to the general public right of navigation, until the premises shall have been so improved as to exclude the public use. Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53.

And so in Maine. It would seem that the real beneficial interest which the riparian owner enjoys in such premises in those States does not greatly differ from the rights of riparian owners in this State. But it is there held that he may convey his upland without the submerged lands, or the latter without the former. Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 487; Barker v. Bates, 18 Pick. 225; Deering v. Long Wharf, 25 Me. 51.

These authorities may be regarded, at least, as supporting the proposition that there is nothing in the essential nature of the riparian owner's right to improve and occupy such premises which forbids its separation from the riparian estate.

We have thus considered that the riparian proprietor has the exclusive right—absolute, as respects everyone but the State, and limited only by the public interests of the State for purposes connected with navigation—to improve, reclaim and occupy the submerged land, out to the point of navigability, for any private purpose, as he might do if it were his separate estate; that this right, even though it may never have been exercised, is recognized and protected by the law as property, of which he cannot be deprived even by the State without just compensation; that the enjoyment of the right—the use of the premises—need not be associated with the use of the upland; that it is for the interest of the State that such waste lands be improved and rendered profitable, while the State is not concerned as to whether the owner of the adjacent upland, or some person to whom he may release his right, make the improvement and enjoy the private benefit; that the rights of other persons are not involved in the question; that when the land has been reclaimed it may be conveyed, according to most of the authorities, apart from the original upland; and that, according to other authorities, the riparian right may be transferred to and enjoyed by the owner of the next adjacent riparian estate. From these considerations, as well as from the authorities cited bearing directly upon the question, we think that the quality of alienability should be deemed to belong to this kind of property, as it does to property in general. See opinion of Bramwell, B., in Nutall v. Bracewell, L. R. 3 Exch. 1, 11.

The only reason opposed to this is the technical one that the right grows out of, and, until severed, is incident to, a riparian estate. We have come to feel that this is unsatisfactory, as a reason why such property should be deemed inseparable from the parent estate, and incapable of a separate existence. If the right in question were created out of, or enjoyed at the expense of, some other estate or property, and were measured and limited by the needs or use peculiar to the riparian estate to which it is annexed, there would be ground for others to urge that the right could not be changed or transferred so as to enlarge the scope of a grant or contract, or so as to prejudice the party complaining. But no such conditions exist. The rights of no one are affected by allowing the riparian owner to convey away this part of his property, as he may his other property. It is only an abstract question whether the right originating in custom, and having originally attached as an incident to his riparian lands, may now be sold and conveyed, and be enjoyed by the purchaser. It is for the interest of the riparian owner that he be allowed to dispose of or use his private property at his own discretion. It is for the interest of the public that such property be subject to purchase and use, where the owner may be incapable of improving it. No one is interested in opposing such unrestricted alienability and use.

Although we have become convinced that the better reason is opposed to our former decision upon this point in Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 38 Minn. 406, we should have deemed it better that a rule of property, although so recently declared, should not be disturbed, were it not that it is supposed that the result of that decision, if adhered to, would be very seriously prejudicial to the tenure of a large amount of very valuable property, which for a long time has been deemed and treated as alienable and enjoyable apart from the riparian lands, and which, according to our present opinion, was rightfully so treated prior to our decision in the Emerson Case.

The case before us shows that in front of the riparian land described in the complaint the reclaimable submerged land extends into the Bay of St. Louis about 850 feet to a dock line legally established under the authority of the State (subsequent, however, to the condemnation by the railroad company); and this condition of things is understood to be very general along the shores of the navigable waters about Duluth. Such lands have been platted and sold to various persons, and have been to a considerable extent improved, and, so far as the State is concerned, have practically become private property. No one but the owners of the original riparian estate can question the rights of the purchasers; and in the case of Miller v. Mendenhall (Minn.), 44 N. W. Rep. 1141, which was submitted, and is decided, in connection with this case, we hold that, notwithstanding the decision in the Esmeron Case, a grantor may be estopped by his covenants from disputing the title of his grantee in respect to such lands. We think that we ought to go further, and hold that the riparian right to improve, reclaim and occupy such premises is transferable.

As we reverse our former decision upon this point, upon which alone this case was determined at the former hearing, it becomes necessary to consider whether, upon other grounds, the condemnation proceedings had the effect to vest in the Railroad Corporation the right to use and occupy for its proper purposes the submerged land beyond the shore. We deem it unnecessary to decide whether the interest appropriated by the condemnation proceedings was the whole estate in fee simple, or only an easement. We will assume that it was only an easement. The corporation acquired the right to the exclusive and perpetual use for railroad purposes of the premises which were the subject of the proceedings. Until in some manner the riparian rights should be severed from the riparian estate, they would remain properly incident and appurtenant thereto. They would pass by a conveyance of the upland, as being appurtenant, although not specifically designated in the deed. So they would be embraced in a lease of the riparian estate. As in the case of alluvial formations along the shore, the person entitled to the exclusive possession and enjoyment of the riparian land would be also entitled to the benefits legally incident thereto. If in the condemnation proceedings the land appropriated be described in terms fitly designating merely the riparian estate, that would be deemed to include the rights incident to that estate, unless, at least, the terms of description were such as to indicate a contrary intention,—an intention to separate the incidental rights from the principal estate,—or unless in some other manner such intention were made manifest. In proceedings for the taking of the riparian estate, the title of which extends to low-water mark, and from which the rights incident to riparian proprietorship had not been in any manner severed, it is to be presumed, in the absence of anything showing a different intention, that the latter were included. Whether in such proceedings (the land owner not consenting to a separation of his riparian rights from the principal estate) a corporation would have the power to appropriate to its use the upland estate merely, neither making compensation for nor assuming to acquire the riparian rights incident thereto, we do not determine.

The condemnation proceedings in question embraced thirty-five distinct tracts of land. These were separately designated in the petition, the several parcels being numbered consecutively from number 1 upwards, the tract in question being the sixth. The land was described by metes and bounds on the landward sides, no line along the shore or water side being given. The last of the lines given is described as extending "into the Bay of St. Louis" the description concluding, "including all the premises between the lines so described and the said Bay of St. Louis." The award of commissioners describes the premises appropriated in the same manner. In the same petition, and in respect to the parcels of land numbered 1, 3 and 5, there was added to the specific descriptions of land the words, "including all riparian rights and privileges," or words of similar import; and it is contended that from the express including of such rights as to such parcels, and from the absence of any reference to riparian rights in respect to the tract in question, it is apparent that it was not intended to embrace them in the condemnation of this land. We think that the conclusion is not justified by this circumstance. While there was but one petition for the appointment of commissioners, the proceeding relates to several parcels of land belonging to different persons, and which in the petition are treated as entirely distinct. The legal effect, as respects the construction of these several descriptions, is not different from what it would have been if separate petitions had been made as to each of the several tracts. In such a case the owner of one of the parcels would not be justified in claiming that the express mention of riparian rights in the petition as to other lands should be deemed to change or modify the natural construction of the terms employed to designate his land, there being no express mention of riparian rights in connection with the latter. There may have been peculiar reasons for the express mention of riparian rights in connection with the other lands embraced in the petition now before us. The relation of those descriptions to that in question is too remote to safely admit the language, adopted with reference to the former alone, to qualify or affect the terms selected for the special purpose of describing the latter particular tract. For these reasons it is considered that the result expressed in our former decision in this case was right, and should not be changed, and the order appealed from is reversed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Thomas GARDNER, Sheriff, Appt.

v.

John W. BUNN et al.

(.....III.....)

1. A judgment by confession entered by a clerk of a court of record in vacation is void, where there is no proof filed of the execution of the power of attorney under which it was confessed, since no jurisdiction is obtained of the defendant.

2. A valid chattel mortgage may be made by the owner of property in possession of another under an execution.

(March 31, 1890.)*

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for De Witt County, in favor of plaintiffs, in an action brought to recover possession of a stock of goods claimed by plaintiffs, but held by defendant under an execution levy. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Moore & Warner for appellant.

Messrs. Conkling & Grout for appellees.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of replevin, brought by John W. Bunn et al. against Thomas Gardner, to recover a stock of goods under a chattel mortgage executed by J. R. Turner & Son to them. The principal question presented by the record arises upon the issue presented by the defendant's sixth plea. In this plea the defendant averred that he took the goods, as sheriff, under an execution directed to him from the Circuit Court of De Witt County, in favor of Mack, Stadler & Co. against J. R. Turner & Son, the mortgagors; that the goods were the property of J. R. Turner & Son, and subject to said execution; and that plaintiffs claimed their rights in and to the goods after the levy. To this plea the plaintiffs replied that the execution therein relied upon was void for the reason that the pretended judgment upon which it was issued was not rendered by the court in term time, but was entered by the clerk of the court in vacation, by confession under a pretended power of attorney, and that no affidavit of the execution of the power of attorney was filed. On the trial of the issue thus presented by the sixth plea, the court held that the judgment rendered by confession in favor of Mack, Stadler & Co. against Turner & Son was void, and that the execution issued on that judgment did not justify the sheriff in withholding the property from the plaintiffs. The judgment of the circuit court was affirmed in the appellate court, and the defendant brings the case here on appeal.

Whether a judgment by confession, entered by a clerk of a court of record in vacation, is void where no affidavit proving the execution of the power of attorney is filed with the power of attorney when the judgment is entered by the clerk, is a question which has never been directly decided by this court; and it is a question not entirely free from difficulty. Section 66, chap. 110, of our statute, which authorizes the confession of a judgment, is as follows: "Any person, for a debt bona fide due, may confess judgment, by himself or attorney duly authorized, either in term time or vacation, without process."

In Roundy v. Hunt, 24 Ill. 598, construction was placed by this court on a statute regulating the practice wherein judgments may be confessed in Kane County, which provided that judgments by confession may be entered at any time in vacation, before the clerk, by filing the proper papers with him, and that said judgment shall have the same effect as if rendered at a term of court. It is there said: "As a condition to the right to confess a judgment in vacation, the proper papers must be filed with the clerk. This requirement of the Statute could have referred alone to the established practice in cases of confession of judgments in courts of record. That practice requires the plaintiff to file a declaration on his cause of action; that he shall file the warrant of attorney, with proof of its execution, and a plea of confession. These, under the practice, constitute the proper papers to authorize the confession of a judgment."

If the language of the Act, upon filing the "proper papers," did not change the common-law practice in such cases, but required a full adherence to that practice, as held in the case cited, we see nothing in the present Statute from which it can be inferred that the common-law practice should in such cases be changed. The language of the Statute authorizing the confession of a judgment in vacation by an attorney duly authorized, clearly required proof to be filed with the clerk showing the execution of the power of attorney. The Statute only empowers an attorney to confess judgment who is duly authorized; and how could it be known that the attorney was duly authorized unless proof of the execution of the power of attorney was filed with that instrument? It will be remembered that the clerk of the circuit court before whom the judgment was confessed possessed no judicial powers. He was a mere ministerial officer, intrusted with the power of entering up a judgment in vacation when certain papers had been filed with him. The sufficiency of the papers, however, he could not pass upon or determine. Of course, the clerk could refuse to act unless papers were filed purporting to conform to the requirements of law; but he could not determine the legal sufficiency of such papers, as that would require the exercise of judicial powers. The confession of judgment in vacation is a statutory proceeding in derogation of the common reached, affirming the decision rendered below. The former opinion in the case is therefore rendered of no importance, and it is consequently omitted. [Rep.]

law, and a judgment of that character will not be valid unless there is a strict compliance with the law under which it may be authorized.

Again, as held in Chase v. Dana, 44 Ill. 283, an attorney in fact is held to a strict compliance with the authority conferred. When he acts, it must, to be sustained, be within the scope of his authority. It must be for the purposes prescribed, and in the mode required. Was there such compliance here? If the attorney who confessed the judgment was not duly authorized, he had no power to act, and his acts would be a nullity. A power of attorney was filed with the clerk, but no evidence was filed that Turner & Son had ever executed that instrument. In the absence of such evidence, there was no authority to enter the judgment. No jurisdiction was acquired over the power of Turner & Son,—an indispensable prerequisite to the rendition of a judgment.

In Durham v. Brown, 24 Ill. 94, where a judgment was confessed in vacation, no affidavit having been filed proving the execution of power of attorney, it was held that the judgment was unauthorized. The same rule was announced in Roundy v. Hunt, 24 Ill. 600. In the case last cited, it is said: "If the plaintiff should fail to file a declaration, a warrant of attorney, with an affidavit of its execution, and a plea of confession by the attorney, the clerk should refuse to enter the judgment."

In Tucker v. Gill, 61 Ill. 236, where a judgment by confession was rendered in vacation for a less amount than conferred by the cognovit, the judgment was held to be void. It is there said: "The plea of cognovit actionem was one of the papers to be filed, and was indispensable to his [the clerk's] authority to make the entry of judgment; and when filed, he must enter the judgment for the amount confessed, or not at all. . . . The proceeding having been in vacation, conducted, under a special statutory authority, by a mere ministerial officer, we must hold that the entry of this judgment in the manner stated was simply void."

It was also held that the language of the Statute, "upon filing the proper papers," under which the judgment was confessed, includes everything requisite by the common-law practice in such cases.

In Iglehart v. Chicago M. & F. Ins. Co., 85 Ill. 514, it was held to be necessary that proof should have been made of the execution of the warrant of attorney before the judgment is confessed, and when the judgment is confessed in vacation the evidence of that fact must appear on the record.

From the cases cited the only fair conclusion to be drawn would seem to be that a clerk in vacation had no power to enter a judgment by confession without proof of the execution of the power of attorney. A judgment cannot be entered unless jurisdiction is first acquired of the person of the defendant. Here the power of attorney purported to authorize the attorney to appear before the clerk, waive process, enter the appearance and confess judgment; but, unless the power of attorney was executed by Turner & Son,—and there is no evidence of that fact in the record,—the attorney had no authority to enter the appearance, and without such authority no jurisdiction of the person was acquired, and, if there was no jurisdiction of the person, the judgment was absolutely void.

In White v. Jones, 88 Ill. 161, where an appearance was entered one day earlier than authorized by the power of attorney, it was held that there was no jurisdiction of the person, and the judgment was void. It is there said: As a rule of general, if not uniform, application, a judgment is void for all purposes unless the court had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, and of the subject matter of the suit. It is also said that jurisdiction is acquired by service of process by publication, or by an entry of appearance in person or by attorney.

In the last case the authority of the attorney to enter an appearance may be contested by the defendant; and, if he shows a want of authority, it defeats the jurisdiction of the court.

In Campbell v. McCahan, 41 Ill. 47, it was held that jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the person is essential to the validity of a judicial sentence. If either is wanting, the judgment or decree is void.

It is, however, claimed by appellant that a judgment entered in vacation without proof of the execution of the power is not void, but valid, unless set aside, on motion of the party against whom it is entered, in the court where it was rendered. Several cases decided in this court have been cited to sustain the position of counsel, and first, Fleming v. Jencks, 22 Ill. 475. In this case the application to vacate the judgment was predicated on the ground that usury constituted a part of the judgment. No question was raised or considered in regard to the proof of the execution of the power of attorney, and we do not think the decision has any bearing on the question involved here.

The next case cited is Rising v. Brainard, 36 Ill. 80. The language used in the opinion in this case may be broad enough to maintain appellants' position, if the question presented by this record had been involved in the case cited, but it was not. As shown by the opinion, but one question was presented: "The error assigned is that a judgment was entered in vacation, by confession under a power of attorney, upon a note, more than a year and a day after the note fell due, without proof that the defendant was then alive, or that the debt was then due."

It will thus be seen that the execution of the power of attorney was not involved, and what the court said on that point has no bearing, because the question was not before the court.

Stuhl v. Shipp, 44 Ill. 184, has also been cited. In that case it is said: "The case of Hinds v. Hopkins, 28 Ill. 351, was so far modified in Rising v. Brainard, 36 Ill. 80, as to render it necessary to apply to the court below to set aside a judgment by confession, and to show some equitable reason therefor, before this court will reverse on the ground that the power of attorney was more than a year and a day old, or its execution not duly proven." This case, like Rising v. Brainard, as will be seen upon an examination of the statement of facts, presented no question in regard to the execution of the power of attorney; and what is said on that question is obiter dictum. In both cases, however, it is decided that where a judgment is entered in vacation, under a power of attorney, more than a year and a day after the power was executed, without filing an affidavit showing that the defendant is alive, and the debt due, the proper practice is to apply to the court in which the judgment is entered to set it aside. It is therefore plain, if the same rule is to obtain where a judgment is entered in vacation without proof being filed of the execution of the power of attorney, then the decision of the appellate court in this case was erroneous. We think, however, that the two questions rest upon a different principle, and the same rule cannot be applied to both. As to the latter question, unless there is proof filed when the judgment is entered that the power was executed, there is no jurisdiction of the person, and the judgment is void. But in the other case, the power of attorney being properly executed, as established by the proof, the court has jurisdiction to enter the judgment; and the matter to be addressed to the court is something which has arisen after jurisdiction was conferred. Such matters arising after the execution of the power may render the judgment unjust or erroneous, but not void; and hence they may, with propriety, be addressed to the court where the judgment was entered; but a void judgment binds no one, and it may be questioned indirectly or collaterally. A few other cases have been cited, but they have no direct bearing on the question, and it will not be necessary to refer to them here.

It is also claimed that, as the property in question was in the possession of the defendant at the time Turner & Son transferred it to the plaintiffs, the interest of Turner & Son was not subject to transfer, so that they could maintain an action in their own names.

In Jones, Chat. Mortg., § 115, p. 102, it is said: "The owner of a chattel not in possession may make a valid mortgage of it, if the person in possession professedly holds under him, and has only a special property in the thing, such, for instance, as that conferred by a pledge or lien."

Here the defendant held under an execution against Turner & Son; and, under the authority cited, they had a right to execute the mortgage under which plaintiffs brought their action.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Casimir de R. MOORE and Wife

v.

(18 R. I.....)

1. An equitable claim for unauthorized

NOTE.—Rights acquired by erecting permanent improvements.

By improving land held in common, a tenant in common acquires no right, title or interest in the portion improved; but rather an equitable charge upon it. And he has a lien, to secure compensation for necessary or proper improvements, on the common property. Curtis v. Poland, 66 Tex. 511.

The part of the proceeds to be allowed for the improvements must be such proportion as the value of the improvements—that is the excess of the value of the whole over the value of the land—bears to the value of the whole premises. Hall v. Piddock, 21 N. J. Eq. 816; Green v. Putnam, 1 Barb. 500.

Partition between co-tenants.

A co-tenant asking for a partition against an owner who has made improvements upon the property is entitled to relief only upon condition that any equities thereby arising shall be taken into account; and that in such case where actual partition is made, and it is possible so to do, the improving tenant will be awarded the portion of the land upon which the improvements have been made. Ford v. Knapp, 3 Conn. Rep. 413, 102 N. Y. 140, 55 Am. Rep. 784; Town v. Needham, 3 Paige, 546; St. Felix v. Rankin, 3 Edw. Ch. 323; Re Heller, 3 Paige, 199; Pickering v. Pickering, 2 New Eng. Rep. 246, 63 N. H. 408; Field v. Leiter, 5 West. Rep. 170, 117 Ill. 341; 1 Story, Eq. §§ 655, 656b.

In an action of partition where the property is sold, a person who has paid a valuable consideration for the property, received a conveyance and made improvements, without notice of the title or claim of the others, is entitled to compensation for such improvements and for taxes paid, to be allowed out of the proceeds, in addition to the share.

used improvements by part owners of land held in common may be allowed to them on a sale for purpose of partition, as well as in a case of actual division.

2. The value of a barn erected by a lessee, under an agreement in the lease by a life tenant and the owners of one half the reof the property unimproved; but no judgment for the money can be given against the other parties. Alleman v. Hawley, 117 Ind. 532.

Although it is not erroneous to permit a counter-claim by defendant in partition, after a finding upon an issue joined by answer, the practice is not to be commended. Ibid.

Co-tenant making improvements protected.

Equity may protect the co-tenant who has made improvements on the common property, by setting apart to him, in partition, the portion improved, if this can be done without detriment to the other co-tenants; or he may be protected, in proper cases, by awarding compensation for improvements beneficial to all, or by considering the value of improvements so made in the adjustment of equities growing out of the fact that he has received and become accountable for rents. Curtis v. Poland, 66 Tex. 511.

A court of equity will, in a proper case, refuse to assist a co-tenant to make partition, unless he does equity by allowing the benefit of the improvements to the party who made them. Scott v. Guernsey, 60 Barb. 179; Re Heller, 3 Paige, 199.

In computation for improvements, the co-tenant against whom they are charged should not be charged with their price, but only his proportion of the amount which they add to the value of the premises, with a deduction to which he may have a claim, for use and occupation by the co-tenant who made the improvements. Cooter v. Dearborn, 2 West. Rep. 399, 115 Ill. 509.

A co-tenant who bona fide erects improvements is not liable for rents before demand made, or for ground rents. Johnson v. Pelot, 24 S. C. 251.

mainder in fee to pay him the fair value thereof on expiration of the lease, should be deducted from the proceeds of the partition sale before distribution thereof, and not be charged upon the interests of those only who signed the lease.

BILL in equity for partition. On hearing as to distribution of proceeds after sale.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edwin Metcalf, Charles Bradley and Walter F. Angell for complainants and certain respondents.

Messrs. Louis L. Angell, William W. Douglas and Samuel T. Douglas for other respondents.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Tristram Burgess devised an estate in Providence, known as the "Hoyle Tavern Estate," to his wife for life, remainder in fee, one half to three daughters, and the other half to those whom his wife should appoint by will. In January, 1873, Mrs. Burgess and the three daughters joined in a lease for a term of fifteen years, covenanting therein to pay the lessee, at the expiration of the term, the fair value of a barn to be built on the premises by him, if it should then be standing. Mrs. Burgess died in 1879, but the lease was allowed to run along to the commencement of this suit, just before the lease expired. Partition by metes and bounds being impracticable, a sale of the premises was ordered, free of all claims by the parties, the lease having then expired, which were reserved to be considered in the distribution of the proceeds. The estate, with the barn thereon, has been sold, the proceeds have been paid into the registry of the court, and the question now presented is whether the value of the barn shall be paid by the three heirs who joined in the covenant, or proportionately by all the owners, some of whom are minors. When a part owner makes valuable improvements, courts of equity agree that compensation should be allowed by setting off the improved portions of the land to him who made the improvements, if it is practicable to do so. See Story, Eq. Jur. § 655; Freeman, Co-tenancy, 2d ed. § 510, and note.

There is, however, some difference about the rule of awarding compensation in the case of unauthorized improvements when partition is made by sale. It has generally been held that a part owner, who has enhanced the value of the common estate at his own cost, is entitled to such equitable compensation as will leave only the value of the estate, without the improvements, to be divided among the tenants in common. Hall v. Piddock, 21 N. J. Eq. 311; Kurtz v. Hibner, 55 Ill. 514; Moore v. Williamson, 10 Rich. Eq. 823; Dean v. O'Meara, 47 Ill. 120; Green v. Putnam, 1 Barb. 500; Conklin v. Conklin, 8 Sandf. Ch. 64; Swan v. Swan, 8 Price, 518. See also Story, Eq. Jur. § 656, and note 3; Freeman, Co-tenancy, supra.

Mr. Freeman (§ 511) refers to cases in Alabama, New York, Arkansas and Indiana as holding a somewhat contrary doctrine.

In Ormond v. Martin, 37 Ala. 605, and Jones v. Johnson, 28 Ark. 211, it is held that the claim for improvements cannot be set off against the body of the estate, but only against a demand for rents.

In Scott v. Guernsey, 48 N. Y. 106, the court says that no compensation can be had for improvements made without consent, mistake or other equitable ground, and hence, in that case, no relief was granted. But the report of the referee shows that the tenants who put the buildings upon the land had exclusively received rents therefrom largely in excess of their value and interest on the investment. The court remarks that if they had offered to share their rents, upon being paid a due proportion for the improvements, it might have afforded a better ground for compensation.

In Elrod v. Keller, 89 Ind. 382, it is held that the mere fact that improvements may enhance the value of common property, not susceptible of division, does not entitle the tenant making them to an allowance for the difference in value; but, in stating the rule, the court concedes that the improved part should be set off to him when it can be done by division. It seems to us that this course, in which all courts agree, is decisive of the question before us. If the tenant has an equitable claim upon improvements in case of division, he has an equally equitable claim upon their value in case of sale. If the other tenants are entitled to their share of the value of the whole estate upon sale, why are they not also entitled to the same share in division? Or, further, if a tenant is entitled to compensation for improvements out of rents, why should he not as well be entitled to receive the excess in value which the improvements have produced upon sale? We see no difference in principle in these cases. When it is conceded that a tenant in common, improving the land he may rightfully occupy, has an equitable claim to that part, or to its rental value, in order to secure the fruit of his labor or expenditure, we fail to see how he loses such claim when the land is sold because it cannot be divided. Of course, he cannot, at his pleasure, charge co-tenants for improvements which they may neither agree to nor desire; nor can he ordinarily claim for that which he has done solely for his own advantage, and from which he has reaped the benefit; but, on the other hand, when such improvements enhance the value and proceeds of the estate, the co-tenants should not be enabled to take advantage, to his injury, of improvements for which they have contributed nothing. Controversies may arise as to the reasonableness and extent of an allowance, but the tribunal which is trusted to fairly apportion the estate itself can also be trusted to fairly settle an incidental matter of this sort.

In the case before us the legal obligation to pay the value of the barn rests only upon the three parties who signed the lease. Doubtless the agreement was made for the benefit of the estate; at any rate, all the heirs have shared equally in the rents. It is not now asked that the other heirs be compelled to pay for anything put upon the estate, but that they receive their full and fair share of the estate sold, less the salable value of the barn, for which they have paid nothing, which, presumably, has aided the rental value of the estate for the years they have received rent for it, and for which it would be manifestly unjust to require others to pay for their benefit. We think it is right that the value of the improvements, so far as they are represented by an enhanced price, should be ascertained and allowed on account thereof, and the balance, representing the body of the common estate, should be divided according to the respective interests of the parties. Let a decree be entered in accordance with this opinion.

A town or village authorized to incorporate for school purposes under Sayles, Ann. Stat., art. 3723, cannot be extended to cover twenty-eight square miles of territory, where the true limits of the real town do not extend from its central point more than three fourths of a mile.

A PPEAL by relators from a judgment of the District Court for Hamilton County in favor of respondents in a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto to declare void the incorporation of the "Hamilton Corporation" and to oust respondents from the exercise of the function of trustees thereof. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. J. P. Estis and G. L. Freeman, for appellants:

The judgment of the court is erroneous in respect to the count of the information, charging that defendants acted as a corporation without being legally incorporated, in view of the admitted fact that at the times and place charged in the information the defendants acted as a corporation, while it does not appear from the evidence that they were incorporated, and it does appear from the evidence that the only proceedings had before and by the county judge of Hamilton County for incorporating the pretended and alleged Hamilton Corporation, of which they were acting as trustees, did not incorporate them or anybody else.

v. Essex Building Assn. No. 4, 87 Md. 320; Hendrick v. Whittemore, 105 Mass. 23. Messrs. G. H. Goodson and J. A. Eidson for appellees.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 20th day of April, 1889, a petition was presented to the County Judge of Hamilton County, praying him to order an election under the Act of April 6, 1881, to determine whether a certain district embracing the Town of Hamilton, and fully described in the petition, should be incorporated as a town for the purpose only of establishing and maintaining a free school therein. Sayles, Ann. Stat. art. 541a.

The petition purported to be signed by thirty-nine residents of the proposed town. The county judge determined that the petitioners were residents of the territory described in the petition, and that it embraced within its limits the requisite number of inhabitants, and ordered that the election be held. The election was held, and, the returns having been made, he declared that the proposition had carried, and that the town was incorporated for free-school purposes only, and ordered an election for five trustees for the town. At an election held in pursuance of the latter order, the appellees were duly elected. They qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties as such trustees, and have ever since continued to act in that capacity. Upon the relation of three taxpayers residing in the alleged town, the district attorney of the Twenty-Ninth Judicial District, by leave of the district judge, filed in the name of the State an information in the nature of a quo warranto, to declare the Act of Incorporation void, and to oust the appellees from the exercise of the function of trustees under such alleged corporation. Upon the trial the court gave judgment in favor of the respondents, and from that judgment the State appeals.

Among other things, the information alleged, in substance, that the alleged corporation was not confined to the limits of the Town of Hamilton; and, in words, that "in fact the pretended limits of the same, as defined by them, extended far beyond the true limits of the real Town of Hamilton as the same is well known, and for several miles into the country outside of said town, so as to include many farms, ranches and unoccupied surveys of land, in extent many times as large as said town, and constituting no part of it or of any town." Upon the trial "it was admitted that the district of country described in the field notes in the said orders [meaning the order of the county judge for the election for the incorporation and that declaring the result] is on an average

One of the relators testified that he resided in the Town of Hamilton, and that he knew the extent and limits of the town, and that "it does not extend from its central point more than three fourths of a mile, and would be entirely embraced by a circle whose radius is three fourths of a mile in length." This testimony is wholly uncontradicted, and the facts testified to must be taken as established. If they were not true, witnesses could easily have been found to disprove them.

It therefore appears that at the time the election was ordered the real Town of Hamilton embraced an area of not more than two square miles, and the question arises whether the Statute authorizing the incorporation of towns and villages was intended to confer upon the inhabitants of any district of country including a town the power to incorporate with limits embracing many square miles of rural territory. If it be held that this power does not exist then the attempted incorporation under consideration is void, and it is unnecessary to determine any other question in the case. In determining whether the power exists or not, we must not lose sight of the purpose of the Statute under which it is sought to be exercised, nor of other statutes upon similar subjects. It is not the object of the Statute in question to confer the power upon the inhabitants of any district in a county to vote a tax upon themselves for the support of the public schools, in addition to the state tax which is levied for that purpose. That power is conferred upon the inhabitants of the school districts by the Act of February 6, 1894. Sayles, Ann. Stat. art. 3733.

The Statute which authorizes towns and villages to establish by a vote a corporation for school purposes only, is by its terms made a part of that chapter of the Revised Statutes which provides a mode for the incorporation of such municipalities. It is only "towns and villages authorized to incorporate under" that chapter which are authorized to incorporate for school purposes only. Id. art. 541a.

The Revised Statutes authorize towns to establish a corporation by an election, provided they contain more than 200 and less than 10,000 inhabitants. Article 506.

No definition of the word "town" is given, and it follows that we must take the word in its ordinary signification,—a collection of inhabited houses. The term carries with it the idea of a considerable aggregation of people inhabiting a certain territory, and engaged in agricultural pursuits, or similar avocations, requiring a considerable area of territory for its support. A section of country so inhabited cannot be called a town, nor treated as part of a town, without doing violence to the meaning ordinarily attached to that word. It follows, from this, that the Legislature did not intend to confer the power of incorporating by election upon a district of country inhabited by people living in residences widely disseminated over its area. The power is conferred only upon towns and villages, and is confined to the actual residents of such localities; and does not carry with it, and confer upon a town, authority to extend the boundaries of the corporation beyond its own actual limits. This ruling is in accordance with the policy of other statutes of a like character. A city already incorporated cannot extend its limits by any one election further than a half of a mile. East Dallas v. State, 78 Tex. 370.

The object of the limitation is to prevent a city from extending its limits, so as to take in a population purely rural; and the policy of the limitation is founded upon the idea that it is unjust to subject a people to the burdens of a municipal government who share none of its benefits. We are aware that in the application of the rule here laid down difficulties are likely to arise. In many instances it may be no easy task, without giving to the town a most irregular shape, so to define its limits as to embrace all its residents, and to exclude at the same time all the rural population living in the vicinity. What should be done in such cases, when a few people not properly belonging to the town have been included, we need not now determine. This case presents no question of difficulty of that character. Here the attempt was to establish a municipal corporation, extending over twenty-eight square miles of territory, not more than two of which were covered by the town. We think this cannot be done, and that the attempted Act of Incorporation was without authority of law, and is void.

The judgment of the District Court is therefore reversed, and a judgment here rendered declaring the attempted Act of Incorporation void, and ousting the respondents from the exercise of the functions of trustees of the alleged Town. The respondents are also adjudged to pay all costs, both in this court and the court below.

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus, to compel respondent to file certain articles of association and to issue a certified copy thereof. Granted.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion. Messrs. Gibson, Bond & Gibson for relators.

Mr. John M. Wood, Atty-Gen., for respondent.

Black, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relators joined in articles of agreement for the purpose of being incorporated by the name of the "La Fayette Park Club," under art. 10, chap. 42, Rev. Stat. 1889, which article consists of sections numbered from 2821 to 2885. On the petition of the relators, the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis made a pro forma decree, declaring that the articles of agreement and the purposes of the association came within the purview of said article, and were not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the United States or of this State. The decree was made pursuant to section 2822.* The articles of agreement and the decree having been duly recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds, the relators presented the same to the Secretary of State, and, without the payment or offer to pay the tax mentioned in section 21 of article 10 of the Constitution, requested him to file the same, and make out and deliver to them a certified copy thereof, that being the final act which gives to the association a corporate existence. The secretary refused to file the articles and issue a certified copy, and hence this proceeding against him by mandamus.

The refusal of the secretary is put upon the ground that the proposed corporation is not one for benevolent, religious, scientific or educational purposes, and therefore not exempt from the payment of the tax; and on the further ground that this association could only be incorporated for the purposes designated in its charter, under section 2834,† and that that section is unconstitutional and void. The objects and purposes of the proposed corporation, as set forth in the articles of agreement, are as follows: "The purposes and scope of said corporation shall be for the encouragement of debating, reading and literature, and the enjoyment of rational social amusements, and the playing of ten-pins, chess and checkers, and other lawful games of the kind. But it is hereby expressly declared that there shall be no saloon in connection with said club, and no drinks shall be sold by the said club or any of its members. It is further declared that this association shall have no connection with any manufacturing, agricultural or business purposes of any kind, nor shall it have any connection with politics or a political organization, nor shall it have in view any pecuniary profit of any kind, but it shall be limited to the general objects above set forth."

Section 21 of article 10 of the Constitution provides: "No corporation, company or association, other than those formed for benevolent, religious, scientific or educational purposes, shall be created or organized under the laws of this State, unless the persons named as incorporators shall, at or before the filing of the articles of association or incorporation, pay into the state treasury fifty dollars for the first fifty thousand dollars or less of capital stock, and a further sum of five dollars for every additional ten thousand dollars of its capital stock," etc.

Section 2821 of the Revised Statutes of 1889 provides, in general terms, that associations may be incorporated for "benevolent, religious, scientific, fraternal, beneficial or educational purposes;" and section 2825 enters more into details, and, after providing for the formation of corporations for benevolent and religious purposes, provides: "Any school, college, institute, academy or other association formed for educational or scientific purposes, including therein any association formed especially to promote literature, history, science, information or skill among the learned professions, intellectual culture in any branch or department, . . . and, in general, any association, society, company or organization which tends to the public advantage, in relation to any or several of the objects above enumerated, and whatever is incident to such objects, may be created a body corporate and politic."

In the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary to recite other statutory provisions. Section 21 of article 10 of the Constitution is

†That section is as follows: "Any association formed for the purpose of establishing a gymnasium or club-house, or for promoting boating, field sports or other rational amusements, or for any other purpose not excluded by section 2829, lawful in itself and not otherwise specially provided for, may also, by complying with sections 2821 and 2822, become a body corporate and politic and under this article shall possess all the rights and privileges and be subject to the limitations and requirements herein provided, so far as the same are applicable thereto." [Rep.]

*The material portions of that section are as follows:

"If the court shall be of the opinion that such articles of agreement and the purposes of the association come properly within the purview of this article, and are not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the United States, or of this State, the court shall enter of record an order to that effect, a certified copy of which order shall, by the clerk, be indorsed upon or attached to said articles.

. . . The Secretary of State shall issue to the petitioners a certified copy of such articles of agreement, with the several certificates thereon as filed in his office, which certificates shall be the charter of incorporation; and thereupon the petitioners, their associates and successors, shall be created and be a body corporate and politic, by the corporate name designated in such charter, and such charter, together with this article, shall be received in all courts and places as legal evidence of the incorporation of such association." [Rep.]

plain. By it no association can be incorporated for any purpose other than for benevolent, religious, scientific and educational purposes without the payment of the tax. This tax, it will be seen, is fixed at $50 for the first $50,000 or less of capital stock, and at $5 additional for every additional $10,000 of stock. Now, it is plain that the payment of the tax cannot be evaded by organizing a corporation under a law which makes no provision for stock. It is equally clear that the Legislature has no power to authorize the evasion of the payment by allowing corporations to be organized under this "Benevolent Law," as it is called, without a capital stock. This court held in express terms in State v. McGrath, 95 Mo. 193, that the payment could not be avoided by reason of a legislative declaration that the corporation was one formed for benevolent purposes, when the law under which it was brought into existence showed that it was a money-making institution. To give effect to the Constitution, corporations, not falling within one of the four classes, must be organized, if at all, under some law providing for capital stock. In so far, therefore, as section 2884 undertakes to allow corporations to be created for other than benevolent, religious, scientific or educational purposes, it is void.

The important question here, however, is whether the proposed corporation can be fairly said to be one for educational purposes. And it is to be observed, in the first place, that the Constitution uses the words, "for benevolent, religious, scientific and educational purposes," in a broad and comprehensive sense. The corporations thus exempted from the payment of the tax are, to a certain extent, mentioned in contradistinction to such as are organized for pecuniary profit. As applied to minors, it has been said "education" comprehends not merely the instruction received at school or college, but the whole course of training, moral, intellectual and physical. Ruohs v. Becker, 6 Meisk. 395.

The following definition appears to have been prepared with care: "'Education' is the bringing up, physically or mentally, of a child, or the preparation of a person, by some due course of training, for a professional or business life or other calling." 6 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 158.

The objects and purposes of the proposed corporation are: (1) the encouragement of debating, reading and literature; (2) the enjoyment of rational social amusements; (3) the playing of ten-pins, chess, checkers and other lawful games of the kind. The first of these declared purposes is clearly educational, and the others seem to be added as matters of amusement, and incidental to the first. That they are incidental is shown by the subsequent statements, wherein it is expressly declared that there shall be no saloon in connection with the club; that drinks shall not be sold by it, or any of its members; and that the association shall not have in view any pecuniary profit. Had the articles of association specified only the first of the designated objects, still the members of the association, under appropriate by-laws, might indulge in any of these amusements without violating the charter. Some degree of liberality must be allowed in the formation of these associations, where all pecuniary profit is excluded. These articles of association can stand on sections 2821 and 2825, and it is our opinion that the proposed association may be incorporated without the payment of the tax.

A peremptory writ is therefore awarded.

All concur, except Ray, Ch. J., and Brace, J., who dissent.

Mr. Thomas Dever, for defendants in error:

For the reasons given, it is unconstitutional, being in violation of section 5 of the Bill of Rights of the State of Kansas, by violating the right of trial by jury. Fourth. That the compensation provided for by law for property taken for public use, as followed in this case, is inadequate, unjust and an unconstitutional method, inasmuch as the appraisers provided for by law are authorized to take into consideration the benefits to be derived by, as well as the damages incurred to, the owner. Fifth. Said Law of 1886 is unconstitutional, and in violation of section 18 of the Bill of Rights of the State of Kansas, which provides that "all persons, for injuries suffered in person, reputation or property, shall have remedy by due course of law and justice administered without delay." This proceeding takes private property for public use without just compensation. Sixth. It is in conflict with section 4 of article 18 of the Constitution of the State of Kansas, which provides that "no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until full compensation therefor be first made in money, or secured by a deposit of money to the owner, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation." Seventh. Said Law of 1886 is unconstitutional, and in violation of section 1, art. 3, of the Constitution of the State of Kansas, in attempting to delegate a legislative power to the judiciary. Eighth. The law is a special one, conferring corporate power."

As to the first objection assigned, it is only necessary to say that the change of the status of a tract of land from a farm to city lots, by the exercise of a power granted cities to extend their limits, is not a deprivation of property without due process of law. As to the second and third objections, it may be remarked that, if the extension of the limits of a city is a purely legislative power, as the plaintiff in error claims, such a power is not exercised by means of a jury trial. To the fourth objection a sufficient answer is found in the statement that neither the Statute we are considering, nor the ordinance passed in pursuance of it, has anything to do with the question of compensation. He might raise the question embraced in the objection on an appeal from the award of the commissioners. The fifth objection mingles legislative and judicial considerations, but the pith of it is contained in the last sentence; but it must be obvious to all that a mere change in the use of land from agricultural to city purposes is not taking private property for public use. The case of Potts v. Pottawatomie Co. v. O'Sullivan, 17 Kan. 58, holds that section 4, art. 18, of the Constitution of this State has application only to canals, railroads and other similar cases in which some corporation takes a use or benefit in the land other than that enjoyed by the public. It is claimed in the eighth objection that the law is a special one, but this is entirely unsupported. By the express terms of the Act, it applies to all cities of the second class.

This leaves the seventh objection to contain the spinal marrow of the contention of the attorneys of the plaintiff in error,—that by this Statute the Legislature attempted to delegate a power to bear and determine whether a proposed ordinance of a city of the second class, extending its limits so as to embrace certain described tracts of land, will be to the interest of the City, and will cause no manifest injury to the persons owning the land. If the findings of the district judge are in favor of the extension, the city is then empowered to pass such an ordinance. If the findings are against the extension, the City has no power to enact that ordinance. While the mode of procedure prescribed by the Act conferring the power is different from that provided in the commencement and conduct of an ordinary action, yet all the essential features and requirements of that "due process of law" that is necessary to give vitality, force and effect to judicial proceedings everywhere are scrupulously observed. The ordinance must be published in the official paper of the City a certain length of time, so as to give notice to all persons whose property interests are in any manner changed or affected by its operation. All such persons are given the right and opportunity to be heard on the question, and to offer evidence to show the injurious operation of the ordinance. The judge has power, after such a hearing, to approve, disapprove or modify the proposed ordinance, and to make findings which, in effect, control the extension of the limits of the City. It would seem that by its terms the action in question does not require the judge to perform any other duty than one purely judicial in its character. The precise question, however, is that, while the exercise of the power conferred is through the instrumentalities of a court, with a close assimilation of the mode and manner of the ordinary exercise of judicial power, the power itself is legislative, and not judicial, that the manner of its exercise does not change the character of the power; that this is legislative power, although attempted to be exercised by the judge, and is violative of, and repugnant to, the distribution of power made by the Constitution among the co-ordinate branches of the state government. This question is one about which courts of last resort differ, their decisions being both contradictory and antagonistic. It being a question of doubt, therefore, it should be resolved against the plaintiff in error, as it is a well-settled rule that the action of the law-making power must in all cases be applied, unless it is manifestly in contravention of the Constitution. In favor of the jurisdiction under statutes similar in scope and expression to our own, see the following cases. Kayser v. Bremen, 16 Mo. 88; Blanchard v. Bissell, 11 Ohio St. 96; Borough of Little Meadows, 25 Pa. 335; Wahoo v. Dickinson, 23 Neb. 426; Burlington v. Lebrich, 43 Iowa, 252.

Against the jurisdiction, see the cases of Galesburg v. Hawkins, 75 Ill. 182; People v. Bennett, 30 Mich. 453; State v. Simons, 88 Minn. 540; People v. Carpenter, 24 N. Y. 86.

There may be other cases, but these are sufficient to indicate the conflict on the question. Our own view can be expressed in a few sentences.

The power to create and regulate municipal corporations, define, extend or limit their boundaries, and commit to them certain subjects for local regulation, is the exercise of a purely legislative authority. An organic command requires this legislation to be applicable to classes, and not special as to each municipality. A general law is passed authorizing cities of the second class to extend their boundaries so as to include adjacent territory, on certain conditions, or depending on certain facts. The existence of these conditions or of these facts is made the subject of judicial inquiry and determination; and this is done to protect the property interests of the land owners, and not to commit the whole control to a city council whose interests in the City might induce arbitrary action against the land owners. In other words, the judge says in each case whether or not the conditions authorizing the absorption by the City exists as to this particular piece of land. The Legislature can confer on the city council power to make a local regulation, and this necessarily involves discretion as to what it shall be; but the question as to whether that discretion has been exercised within the limitations of the power delegated is a judicial question, pure and simple, and nothing else. This section of the Statute does not confer upon the judge the power to extend the limits of the City in the first instance, but only to approve or disapprove the ordinance of the City making the extension. If that part of the section requiring the district judge to make and certify the findings had been omitted, and the city council had then passed an ordinance to extend the limits of the City so as to include this land in controversy, could it be doubted but that the owner, in a proper action instituted for that purpose in the District Court of Geary County, could contest with the City its power, under the delegated authority, to include these tracts of land? We think not. To avoid separate suits of this character by individual land owners and before property interests are affected and perplexing complications arise, this section provides for a determination of the rights of all the parties in one action. The practical effect of this Statute is to submit to the district judge, in advance of its enactment, the question of the legality of the city ordinance. The Legislature of this State can only create and regulate municipal and other corporations by general laws. It cannot either enlarge or reduce the corporate limits of the city of the second class (Gray v. Crockett, 30 Kan 188; Wyandotte v. Wood, 5 Kan. 603) by special enactment.

It is manifestly absurd to contend that, when any one of the cities of the second class wants to extend its limits so as to include adjacent territory, the only manner in which it can be done is by a legislative enactment extending the limits of all the cities of the second class in the State. The particular necessities of each city of the second class are such that, coupled with our constitutional provisions, the only manner in which their corporate limits can be extended is by a general law authorizing the ex-terms and conditions as will not-jury of owners of adjacent prop-empower a city government to-clude agricultural land within-limits. We had occasion in the case of Smith, 42 Kan. 433, to say that "no good reason can be given, why the plain of is unconstitutional." On the general propositions involved of Kirkpatrick v. State, 5 Kan. harmony with what we have said.

All these considerations are in controlling our opinion in favor of the power conferred by the State on the district judges of the State. The homestead does not arise. There is no objection to the petition that the land was as a homestead.

Mr. Myron H. Walker for plaintiff, appellee.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sued defendant Robert Patterson for injury sustained by her in consequence of his having sold liquor to her husband. She obtained judgment [see 1 L. R. A. 706] and thereupon brought this suit upon the liquor bond signed by defendant Patterson as principal and the other defendants as sureties. She recovered judgment in the court below. The bond was dated May 5, 1886, and was the bond required by How. Stat., § 2278. The bond was accepted and approved by the town board May 12, 1886, and their approval indorsed thereon May 15. It was filed with the county treasurer May 27. The act of Patterson for which plaintiff recovered her judgment occurred between the date of the approval of the bond and its filing with the county treasurer. Defendants insist that no liability could be incurred under this bond until it had been filed or delivered to the county treasurer. This is the principal question in the case.

1. This is a statutory bond, and must be interpreted according to the intent and meaning of the legislative enactment. It runs to the people of the State of Michigan. Under the Statute, the sureties must sign and justify. It must be approved by the town board, and their approval indorsed. It must then be filed with, or delivered to, the county treasurer. No discretion in regard to the receipt and filing is lodged with the county treasurer. When presented, with the approval of the town board indorsed thereon, he is bound to receive it and file it. The filing is clearly for the benefit of the public, and those who may be entitled to remedies under it.

The word "delivered," used in this Statute, was clearly not intended to be used in the legal sense of a delivery necessary to the execution of a contract. The fact that, in the Statute, the word "filed" is used interchangeably with "delivered," appears to me conclusive on this point. The duty of the treasurer is merely clerical, not intended as an act to give effect to the bond, but to make and perpetuate a record of it. "Delivery," in the sense that it is necessary to the complete execution of a contract, implies a discretion both as to tender and acceptance. A deed may be properly signed, witnessed and acknowledged, but it is not executed until delivery. The grantor may or may not deliver it as he chooses. When the Statute provides that a bond shall be deposited, filed with or delivered to some public officer, to whom it gives no discretion in the matter, it makes his duty purely clerical. We must therefore look to the Statute for some other time fixed by it when this bond can be regarded as executed, and given legal effect. That time, in my judgment, is fixed upon the approval of the bond. This court has said that such a bond is valid when accepted and approved by the common council. People v. Lansing (Mich.) 41 N. W. Rep. 434.

The defense is based upon the theory that there can be no liability as against the sureties until the principal had complied with all the provisions of the law prerequisites to his commencing the business. If defendant Patterson had filed his bond the day after its approval, but failed to pay the tax, the defendants might with equal propriety claim this as a defense, and say, as they now say, that they had a right to believe that their principal would comply with the law before entering upon the business. If Patterson had left this bond with the town board, to be filed by them with the treasurer, and the board had failed to do so, would this defense then be urged? What difference can it make whether Patterson gave the bond to someone else to file with the treasurer, or took it himself for that purpose? He was then carrying on the business. His bond said so. He intended to file it, and did file it afterwards.

ute provided before whom, a bond should be taken. The bond is made. It is the obligation of the signers when being signed. It is the court or judge, etc., and is adjudged sufficient. . . . I mean it is the operative act on parties, and not before."

The case of McFicken v. W. How, 893 [12 L. ed. 448], involves of the signers to a promissory note also the cases of Huron v. J. Mich. 430, and Bullock v. Taylor. They have no application to the

Such a consequence would enable the obligors to escape of their own wrong as against the innocent parties, and cannot be protected by any possibility of protection."

Does not the same reasoning apply to this case? The authorities cited by the defendant of their contention. One of them states the rule contended for by none of the others are in conflict.

The case of State v. Toomer was a bond of a master in equity, prescribed several prerequisites master to enter upon his duties, and he should not enter upon them until the clerk's office and the commissioners that he had taken his bond, and that if he complied with these requisites the office was vacant. This was held to be no action against the sureties. 7 R.

His official acts as to third persons are valid, and for official defaults he is liable. A bond is clearly complete and operative, when all the acts necessary to give it validity have been performed. When these have been performed and the principal commences the business mentioned in the bond for the purpose of which the sureties have been bonded, the bond is then in full force and effect, and the liability of the sureties attaches. When the bond was executed, the principal was carrying on the business, and it is fair to say that his sureties knew it. I find no moral or legal, upon which they can rely. If defendant's contention be correct, ing or delivering any such liquors." The right to recover such damages is not made dependent upon the fact that the liquor dealer is legally engaged in the business. As well might it be claimed that the bondsmen have the right to presume that liquor dealers will not sell on the Fourth of July, or any other day upon which sale is prohibited, and therefore that they are not liable when injury results.

2. Upon the filing of the bond, it related back to its date, and covered the time prior to its filing. The rule is well settled that contracts of suretyship affecting ordinary business transactions take effect only from the date of their execution, which includes delivery, and that they will not be given retroactive effect unless so expressly provided. But it by no means follows that this rule extends to statutory bonds, given for the protection of third parties, covering a period of time fixed by the Statute. The Statute requires that every liquor dealer shall yearly execute such bond. It continues in force for one year from the first of May. It was the evident intent of these parties to comply with this provision. They signed the bond on the 12th of May, and deliberately dated it back to the 5th of May. It recited that Patterson then professed to carry on the business. They are presumed to know the law and to have contracted with reference to it. They deliberately made their bond to speak from the 5th. As a matter of fact he was carrying on the business. The only fair conclusion to be drawn is that they intended the bond to relate back to and cover the period from its date.

In State v. Finn, 23 Mo. App. 990, the sheriff was elected in November. On November 21 he gave the bond required by the Statute. November 29 the court, for some reason which does not appear, ordered a new bond to be given in lieu of the first. Suit was brought for money received by the sheriff between the 21st and the 29th. The sureties were held responsible for the sheriff's conduct during his entire official term.

In Alma L. Ins. Co. v. American Surety Co., 34 Fed. Rep. 291, the bond sued upon was dated June 15, and was to run for the term of twelve months ending June 15, the following year. It was not delivered or accepted until July 29. The court held that the liability of the surety accrued by relation as of its date, and that the sureties were liable for all defaultations prior to July 29. In that case the parties in the bond fixed the term. In this case the Statute fixes it.

3. It is the established rule that sureties are estopped to deny the facts recited in their obligations, whether true or false. Brandt, Sur. §§ 29, 30.

Where the bond recited that A was appointed paymaster, it was held that he and his sureties were estopped to deny that fact. United States v. Bradley, 85 U. S. 10 Pat. 303 [9 L. ed. 448].

Where the bond recited that B was appointed a wharfinger, it was held that his sureties were estopped to deny it. People v. Huson, 78 Cal. 154.

It is also held immaterial whether there be any such office as is set up in the bond. Jagers v. United States, 32 Fed. Rep. 890.

Where a replevin bond recited that it was signed by B, the principal, who was in fact dead at the time, the sureties were held estopped to deny that B had signed it. Collins v. Mitchell, 5 Fla. 364.

Neither Patterson nor his sureties can take advantage of his neglect to file the bond. His failure to do so was his own wrongful act. Stevensada, Treasurers, 2 McCord, L. 107.

In that case the sheriff could not by law enter on the duties of his office until he had filed a certificate from commissioners that he had executed and filed a bond with the treasurer. The court says: "Neither he nor the sureties can take advantage of his wrongful neglect. . . . The approval by the commissioners, the certificate . . . are no more than the mere modes of giving, examining and perpetuating the bond. These are not of the essence, and constitute no part of the obligation, of the contract."

In the case at bar the defendant's sureties had done all that the law required, and all that they could do, to complete the bond. They had signed and justified to it. It had been approved. They left it with their principal, Patterson, to file. It recited that he was then professing to carry on the business. They are therefore estopped, both by law and reason, to make this defense. It is notorious that liquor dealers, by the implied, if not the express, assent of the officers charged by the law with the duty of enforcing it, are often permitted to carry on the business until they can raise the money to pay the tax. It would in my judgment, be a direct violation of the spirit and intent of this law to relieve them and their sureties from liability upon their bonds under such circumstances. To hold them liable gives the protection which the law intended to innocent parties, who are not, and cannot well be, charged with any duty in regard to the execution or filing of the bond. To relieve them would result in opening the door to intentional as well as careless evasions of the law.

4. The court correctly rejected the offer of defendants to show that after they heard of the injury to plaintiff's husband they demanded the surrender of the bonds, and that Patterson promised to surrender them.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

The other Justices concurred.

Memo. Carlisle & Hydrick for respondent.

Simpson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One Wash Pool, in October, 1873, executed a seal note, with W. H. Bagwell as surety, to Alie Lipcomb, for $440, payable one day after date. The rate of interest was not mentioned, but, of course, it bore from its date the usual interest of 7 per cent. Some time after this both Pool and Bagwell died, and the action below was brought by Alie Lipcomb on this note against the defendant as administrator of Bagwell, deceased. During the progress of this action Alie Lipcomb died, and her executor, Sanders, was substituted as plaintiff. At the trial plaintiff introduced the note, stating that there was an addendum thereto, which he did not introduce in evidence, and to which he would object, if the defendant attempted to introduce it. Upon the close of plaintiff's testimony, the defense introduced this addendum, which, it seems, was "on the lower end of the note." The addendum was in the following words, to wit: "The above note is to be accounted for, with interest at 8 per cent per annum. [Signed] Wash Pool."

His honor Judge Hudson, presiding, "charged that the note was a good and valid obligation of Bagwell, and that there was nothing in the case going to discharge him from liability," holding that the addendum relied on as a defense should be determined under the law applicable to contracts, under which he held that said addendum was without consideration, and was a nudum pactum as to Pool, no consideration appearing on its face, and none proved. He further held that, even if there had been a consideration, it was not such an alteration of the contract as would prejudice the surety, and therefore, if the jury believed the evidence, they should render a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the note, which was accordingly rendered.

The defendant appealed upon exceptions, as follows: "(1) Because it is respectfully submitted the circuit judge erred in holding the agreement signed by the principal, Pool, changing the rate of interest on the note in suit to 8 per cent, was a nudum pactum, and not binding on said principal, and in so charging the jury. (2) In holding that, even if the agreement was a valid contract binding on the principal, it did not change the terms of the original contract to the prejudice of the surety, and hence the estate of the surety was not discharged, and in so charging the jury. (3) In not charging the jury that this agreement was binding on Pool, unless he could show want of consideration, and, being so binding on said principal, it released the surety. (4) In not charging the jury that this agreement showed on its face a consideration; that it was binding on the principal, Pool. (5) In not, at least, leaving it to the jury to say whether, from the passing upon questions of fact which belonged exclusively to the jury. (7) In instructing a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed."

It is proper to state here, briefly, our understanding of the law applicable to questions as to the effect of alterations in notes, after execution, upon the rights of the parties thereto, and also of subsequent agreements or contracts in reference to such notes. Any material alteration of a note after execution and delivery will destroy it as to all the parties not consenting to such alteration, and this, too, whether there is a single maker, or one or more makers, whether they are joint and several, and whether they are all principals or some are sureties. This is upon the ground that every contracting party has the right to stand upon the contract which he makes, and no one is authorized to change such contract without his consent, and therefore any alteration in the body of the note making such change renders it void, upon the same principle, any independent valid contract, made by the principal as to such note, will release the surety, in the absence of his consent, whether said contract is prejudicial to the surety or not; provided, however, the contract is one which affects the note in some material point of view, such as obtaining time, increasing the amount of either principal or interest, etc.

Now, the question arises, Did his honor charge in conflict with these principles? First, Was there a material alteration of this note by the addendum, or was the addendum to be considered and adjudged under the law of contracts? and, if so, Was his honor's ruling in that aspect of the question correct? There is no doubt that had this addendum been incorporated directly in the body of the note, by interlineation or otherwise, that the note would have been destroyed utterly as to Bagwell at least. It was, however, not thus incorporated, but was written below, as it is said in the testimony, on the "lower end of the note."

In a case in New York (the case of Woodworth v. American Bank, 10 Johns 381) referred to and discussed by Mr. Daniel in his work on Negotiable Notes, etc., a memorandum in the margin of the note, simply changing the place of the payment, was held as fatal as if incorporated in the body. 3 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1383.

And he further states that where the words "with lawful interest" were written on the corner of the note, it was held to be material, and to avoid the note as against nonconsenting parties. Id. § 1385, referring in the notes to Warrington v. Early, 9 Ill. & B. 703, and Sutton v. Toomer, 7 Barn. & C. 416. See 3 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 1383, 1385, and the notes.

In addition, we think that in the case below the evident intent of the addendum was to alter the note in the material matter of the rate of interest, and not to make a new contract, binding upon Pool alone, in reference thereto. What is its language? Not that Wash Pool promises and agrees to pay interest at said rate, but that the above note is to be accounted for at said rate. By whom? Why, by the makers. That seems to us to be the fair and reasonable explanation of the matter, and of the intent of the addendum; and inasmuch as, doubtless, there could be no difference of opinion as to its effect had it been interlined in the note, we think upon the authorities above, and on account of its purpose, there should be no difference, because of the fact that it was written on the lower end of said note. It was still on the note, and, as far as Pool could make it so, was a part thereof. See also 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 149, 150, as to memorandums on notes, where numerous examples are given of matters incorporated in the note by indorsement on the same paper on which the note is written, whether in the "four corners," at the bottom, on the margin, or on the back.

It is true the most of these examples refer to memorandums made at the time of the execution of the note, but they determine the question that an alteration may be made thereby, although not literally incorporated in the body; and, if so when thus made contemporaneously with the note, why not the same effect when made afterwards?

But, supposing the addendum is to be looked at in the light of a contract, was his honor correct in the charge thereon? The addendum, if examined under the law of contract, upon its face, and in the absence of evidence, we think, with his honor, was nudum pactum. Sealed instruments, notes, etc., it is true, import a consideration, and also bills of exchange and negotiable notes; not so, however, with other contracts and notes. On the contrary, in these latter cases a consideration must be both alleged and proved; we do not regard the addendum as either a seal note or a negotiable form note.

But we think his honor was in error in holding that even if the contract was based upon a sufficient consideration, and therefore binding on Pool, yet that the surety was not discharged, because, as his honor held, the surety not being bound, he was not prejudiced; in other words, that, to release the surety by a new contract made by the principal with the payee, the contract must be prejudicial to the surety. We do not so understand the law upon this subject. On the contrary, any valid contract between the payee and the principal, by which the terms of the original note are altered in any material particular, whether prejudicial to the surety or not, will vitiate the note as to him, if made without his consent. Gardner v. Gardner, 28 S.C. 588, and the cases there cited.

It is hardly necessary to say that an alteration as to the time of payment, the amount to be paid, or the rate of interest, and, as held in many cases, the place of payment, would be material, and would release the surety although the change might in some cases be beneficial to the surety.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Messrs. Carlisle & Hydrick for respondents.

McIver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action in this case was upon two negotiable notes dated 30th of December, 1884, and payable 1st of December, 1893, signed by one Eber C. Allen as principal, and defendant as surety, and made payable to the plaintiffs. It seems that the plaintiffs had recovered two judgments, before a trial justice, against said Eber C. Allen, and also held an open account against him. One of the notes in suit was given for the amount of the two judgments, and contained an indorsement thereon to that effect, and that when the note was paid the judgments were to be canceled. The other note was for the amount of the store account. The defense was that defendant signed the notes as surety upon the condition that they were not to be delivered to the payees until the two judgments were marked "Satisfied."

Testimony was introduced tending to show that, the plaintiffs being about to press the two judgments, it was agreed that if Eber C. Allen would secure the amount thereof, as well as the amount of the account, by his own note, with his mother, the defendant, as his surety, indulgence would be extended to him for the time specified in the notes. Accordingly, Eber C. Allen signed the two notes, and took them off to procure his mother's signature, and in a few days thereafter delivered them to the plaintiffs properly signed by her. There was also evidence tending to show that defendant signed the notes upon the condition that they were not to be delivered to the plaintiffs until the two judgments above mentioned were canceled. Whether this condition was communicated to the plaintiffs when the notes were delivered was the subject of some conflict of testimony, Eber C. Allen testifying that it was, while the plaintiffs and their attorney, Mr. McCravy, who conducted the negotiations on behalf of the plaintiffs, testified to the contrary.

The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and judgment having been entered thereon, defendant appealed upon the several grounds set out in the record, which, however, make substantially but two questions, viz. (1) whether the circuit judge erred in charging upon the facts; (2) whether there was error in instructing the jury that, even if the defendant did sign the notes upon the condition stated, which it is conceded is not complied with, she would nevertheless be liable thereon, unless the plaintiff had notice that she signed upon such conditions.

fails to disclose any violation of the Constitution in charging upon the facts. On the contrary, it seems to us that every material question of fact was fairly left to the jury, without any expression or even intimation of opinion on the part of the circuit judge.

As to the second question, while it is not to be denied that there is some conflict in the cases elsewhere, we think the decided weight of authority, as well as argument, is in favor of the proposition that where one signs a negotiable note perfect on its face, as surety for another, upon the condition, known only to the principal, that it is not to be delivered to the payee until something else is done, the surety will be liable, even if such condition be not complied with, unless notice is brought home to the payee of such condition. This proposition does not rest alone upon the peculiar character of negotiable paper, but upon the well-settled principle that where one of two innocent persons must suffer the loss should fall upon him who put it in the power of a third person to cause such loss, as well as upon the principle that where an agent is clothed with apparent authority to do an act he may bind his principal, within the limits of that authority, whatever may have been his private instructions.

Here the principal debtor, after signing the notes, takes them to the defendant for the purpose of procuring her signature as his surety, in accordance with the agreement made by him with the plaintiffs, and, when he delivers them properly signed, surely the payees cannot be affected by any private instructions which the surety may have given to her principal, unless the same were communicated to the payees. The surety, by signing the notes complete in form, and placing them in the hands of her principal to be delivered to the payees, even though upon a condition, has placed it in the power of her principal to deceive the payees; and, if loss ensued, it must fall upon the one who contributed to that loss, rather than upon the innocent payees, who were left in ignorance of the conditions upon which the notes were signed. The principal debtor was the agent of the surety, and not of the creditor; and, if he has done an act for the doing of which he was clothed with apparent authority, even though it may have been done in violation of his private instructions, the person who invested him with such apparent authority must take the consequences. Any other view would, it seems to us, greatly impair, if it did not absolutely destroy, that confidence so necessary to the business interests of the community in negotiable paper; for it would render it necessary, before a negotiable note could be discounted by a bank, or by a private individual, that inquiry should be made of the indorser or surety as to whether they had signed their names upon conditions, and this, surely, could not be tolerated. That these views are well supported by authority may be seen by reference to the case of Jordan v. Jordan, 10 Lea, 134, where the subject is fully discussed, and the authorities cited; also Marbo v. First Nat. Bank, 79 Ala. 800, as well as the case cited in 6 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 860, note 2.

It is urged, however, that the notes in this case, though negotiable in form, being still in the hands of the original payees, are not entitled to the protection which paper of that class would receive in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, to whom they had been transferred before maturity. But we do not think that this can affect the question. Of course, if these notes had been transferred before maturity to an innocent holder for value, no such question could arise; and therefore the question in the cases we have cited arose in cases where the original payees were still the holders. The plaintiffs here agreed to extend indulgence for a stipulated time if the debts were secured by the notes in question, and that was a valuable consideration, outside of the original debt, and the indulgence was extended for the time stipulated—in fact for a much longer time—upon the faith of defendant's suretyship; and now to deprive them of the consideration upon which such indulgence was extended on the ground that the principal debtor has violated his private instructions from his surety, of which the plaintiffs had no notice, would, it seems to us, operate as a fraud upon the plaintiffs.

Some of the cases, notably Dair v. United States, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 1 [21 L. ed. 491], followed by Butler v. United States, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 272 [23 L. ed. 614], have extended the principle above laid down to unnegotiable as well as negotiable instruments. While there is much force in the reasoning employed in those cases, we do not deem it necessary at this time to consider that question.

The cases of Gourdin v. Read, 8 Rich. 41, 280, and Mills v. Williams, 16 S. C. 598, relied on by appellant, we do not think in point, not simply because in those cases the instruments involved were unnegotiable, but because in neither case were they complete in form. Indeed, in the latter case the instrument, on its face, showed that the instrument was intended to be delivered to a person other than the plaintiff, and for a purpose different from that for which it was used; and in the former case, the bond being in blank, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to inquire into the authority of the surety to fill the blanks. The practical result of these two cases is simply this: that where the instrument in question is in such form as would naturally excite inquiry, then the person who takes it must be deemed to have notice of such facts as such inquiry, properly prosecuted, would disclose. In this case, however, it does not appear that there was anything in the form of the notes calculated to excite inquiry, and therefore we think there was no error on the part of the circuit judge in instructing the jury that, unless they found that the plaintiffs had notice of the private instructions which the defendant may have given to her agent, the principal debtor, as to the condition upon which the notes were to be delivered, the plaintiffs could not be affected thereby.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

(February 22, 1890.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court denying his claim to a homestead exemption of his interest in certain partnership property which plaintiff sought to reach by proceedings supplementary to an execution for the satisfaction of a judgment. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Bomar & Simpson and S. M. Pilgram, for appellant:

Defendant and his invalid sister, who lives with him and is supported by him, constitute a family.

NOTE.—Family defined.

The primary meaning of the word "family" is "children." It must be so construed unless the context shows that it was used in a different sense. Phillips v. Ferguson (Va.) 1 L. R. 87.

In the popular acceptance of the word, it includes parents, children and servants, domiciled in the same house and under one head. Cheshire v. Burlington, 31 Conn. 329.

As to the head of the family, see note to Miller v. Finegan (Fla.) 6 L. R. A. 312.

in a household and kept by the mother, do not constitute a family.

Whalen v. Culman, 11 Iowa, 226; Dendy v. Gamble, 64 Ga. 536; Moore v. Parker, 18 B. C. 496; Garaty v. DuBois, 5 S. C. 493.

Appellant's sister could not, as his family, claim the exempt property in case of his death.

Gen. Stat. § 1996.

The object of the protection afforded by the homestead clause of the Constitution was the family, the head of the family standing as its representative.

Aorton v. Bradham, 21 B. C. 381.

Melver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding to subject the interest of defendant in a certain partnership, of which he was a member, to the payment of a debt due by him to the plaintiff, under proceedings supplementary to an execution. Defendant claimed that his interest in said partnership did not amount to the sum of $500, and was therefore exempt under the Homestead Laws of the State. The circuit judge held that the defendant was not entitled to the exemption claimed for two reasons. (1) because he was not the head of a family, (2) because the homestead exemption "is not allowable in partnership property." From this judgment defendant appeals, imputing error to the circuit judge in both of said rulings.

The question whether one is the "head of a family," in the sense of that phrase as used in the Homestead Law, is a question of law, to be determined from a consideration of the facts in a given case. The question is, What is the legal conclusion to be drawn from the facts presented? To determine this question it is necessary to consider, first, What is meant by the phrase "head of a family," as used in the Homestead Law? and then to inquire whether the facts in a given case bring the applicant within the true meaning of that phrase. The accepted definition of the word "family," as given by lexicographers, and approved in many cases, seems to be: "The collective body of persons who live in one house, under one head or manager." The number of persons thus living together is not at all important, except that there must be more than one; as it is quite certain that two persons may constitute a family, a g., husband and wife, father and child. It is also well settled that it is not necessary that the relation of husband and wife nor that of parent and child should exist in order to constitute a family. Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 3 B. C. 226; Garaty v. DuBois, 5 S. C. 493; Moore v. Parker, 18 B. C. 496; Rollings v. Beane, 13 B. C. 316.

But, where these relations are absent, we have no case in this State, so far as we are informed, which decides distinctly what other relations existing between persons living together will be sufficient to constitute a family; but, as was said by Simpson, Ch. J., in Rollings v. Beane, supra, the term "family" is not to be taken in a restricted sense, but "in its ordinary sense, which includes persons living in one house, and under one head or manager;" and, as was said by Moore, Ch. J., in Garaty v. Du 7 L. R. A.

but to those whose relations to the head demand, on the one hand, support and protection, and, on the other, require a contribution, by the aid of their labor, to the maintenance and conduct of the general establishment to which they belong. . . . It would not follow that, although the head of a family might not be a parent, the one substituted as the head would lose the favor of the provision; for it would extend to one having under his roof those so connected with him by ties of residence and association as to become part and parcel of his household, changing their domicile with him, and having no residence but that which they enjoy under his favor." We do not think that the former chief justice in using the words "his roof" meant to imply, as is urged by counsel for respondent, that one of the conditions necessary was that the person claiming to be the head of a family should be the owner of the house in which the collective body of persons alleged to constitute the family resided; for, as matter of fact, it is well known that many persons who are undisputed heads of families reside in houses which they do not own, but which are owned by their wives. Nor do we think that it is necessary that there should be any legal obligation on the part of the one claiming to be the head of a family to support the members thereof, but a moral duty, arising from ties of blood, or, possibly, other similar relations, will be sufficient. As is said in 7 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 804, note 3: "The test of a legal duty has been rarely applied, and unquestionably a moral duty to support the members of a family is sufficient to constitute one its head,"—citing Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, § 45.

Accordingly we find that it has been held in Arnold v. Waltz, 53 Iowa, 706, that an unmarried woman keeping house, and there bringing up two children of her deceased sister, is the head of a family, though she has taken no steps to adopt said children under the Statute of that State, in Wade v. Jones, 20 Mo. 75, that a brother living with his widowed sister and her four small children, and providing for them, is the head of a family; in Bailey v. Comings, 16 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 353, that a bachelor who supports a widowed sister, who keeps house for him, may be the head of a family.

We are inclined to agree with what is said by Anderson, J., in Calhoun v. Williams, 28 Gratt. 18: "The whole theory and policy of the Homestead (Law) is founded upon the principle that there is a natural and moral obligation on the head of a family to provide for the support of his wife and children, and other persons dependent on him, towards whom he stands almost in loco parentis, which is, if not paramount, equal to his obligation to pay his debts. . . . The family may consist of a wife and children, or of other persons, who may stand in a state of dependence in the family relation; or it may consist of persons standing in either of these relations to the head of the family, whether the father or mother, or a brother or a sister, or other relation, is the head, but they must be persons who are dependent in some measure on the head for support, and who have an interest in his holding his property, and would be prejudiced by its seizure and sale under execution, or other process, and who would be benefited by its exemption."

Testing this case by these principles, we think it clear that the defendant must be regarded as the head of a family, and as such entitled to the exemption claimed. The undisputed testimony of the defendant is: "My sister and myself live together as one family. Have so lived for eight years. She is sickly. She has nothing now but the house and lot. She has no other close relatives except myself. I support my sister, and run the establishment. Have one servant hired. My sister is dependent upon me for support, and I support her as a part of my family." Another witness says: "Drummond and his sister live together. He supports her."

It seems to us clear that this testimony is quite sufficient to show that these two persons, bearing the close relation of brother and sister, live together as one family; that she is dependent upon him for a support, which he provides for; and that he, as the head of the household, manages and controls, hires the necessary servants, and provides for the table, etc.—she, doubtless, keeping house for him, though that fact is not explicitly stated. It is true that the sister owns the house in which they live, but this manifestly would not afford that invalid female the barest support, for the testimony is that it would not rent for more than $25 a year, and she is therefore clearly dependent upon her brother for the means of living.

The only other inquiry is whether there was error in holding that a homestead exemption is not allowable in partnership property. We see nothing in the Constitution or statutes which limits this exemption to personal property held in any particular manner. On the contrary the language of the Constitution since the Amendment of 1890 is very general in its character, and must be regarded as embracing any species of personal property, whether held in severalty or in common, or in any other manner. This is in accordance with the principles decided in Nance v. Hill, 26 S. C. 227, and Mellichamp v. Mellichamp, 28 S. C. 125, where the right to a homestead in property held in common was recognized. It is true that there may be, as in the cases cited, a practical difficulty in assessing or setting apart to a claimant of such an exemption in partnership property the particular property exempt; but that difficulty does not present itself in this case.

Alexander T. RICHARDS et al., Appts.

(...Pa....)

The fact that a surety on a bond signed it in the expectation that his partner would also sign it as surety, which, for some reason, he failed to do, will not relieve the one who signed from liability.

(April 7, 1890.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, of Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiffs in an action to enforce an alleged obligation upon a contractor's bond. Affirmed.

Richards had entered into a contract with plaintiffs to erect for them a certain manufactory, and they required of him a bond to insure the faithful performance of the contract and the delivery of the building free from liens.

The bond began as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, That Alexander T. Richards, contractor, as principal, and R. J. Watson and F. C. Gillingham, trading as Watson & Gillingham, lumber merchants, as sureties, all of the City of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, are held and firmly bound unto James Whitaker and Theodore Whitaker, trading as James Whitaker & Bro.," etc.

It was signed as follows:

"Alexander T. Richards [Seal].
"R. J. Watson [Seal]."
[Seal]."

After the building was delivered some mechanic's liens were enforced against it, and this action was brought upon the bond to recover the amount paid to discharge them.

At the trial the bond was offered in evidence by plaintiffs. It was objected to on the ground that defendants had denied its execution and also that the bond seeks to bind the defendant Watson. It was admitted and exception taken.

Watson defended on the ground that there was an agreement that if he would go on the bond one Michael Magee would also go on it, and that he executed the bond on the faith of this agreement, and as it was never fulfilled he was discharged.

He also defended upon the ground that the bond in the body thereof purported to be executed by Gillingham as well as by himself, and that until Gillingham signed it Watson's signature was not binding.

The court below rejected these defenses and directed the jury to return a verdict for plaintiffs, and defendants took this appeal.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. G. Harry Davis and John G. Johnson for appellants.

Mr. Josiah R. Adams for appellees.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The weak spot set up in the defense below is to be found in the fact that there was no evidence to show that when Watson signed the bond in controversy, he did so upon the condition that he was not to be bound unless his partner, Gillingham, also signed it. The de-defendants contended that the bond was intended to bind not only the firm of Watson & Gillingham, of which firm Watson was a member, but that it was contemplated that Mr. Magee should sign as a co surety. The bond sets forth the name of Alexander T. Richards, as principal, and of "R. J. Watson and F. C. Gillingham, trading as Watson & Gillingham," as sureties; but there is no mention of Magee's name, and so far as his alleged omission to sign is concerned, the defense, under all the authorities, is without merit.

We have no occasion to go outside of our own State for authority upon this question.

Sharp v. United States, 4 Watts, 21, was the case of a bond given in pursuance of an Act of Congress which required that it should be executed by two or more sureties. It was signed by one surety only. He had a right to suppose the bond would be executed in accordance with the Act of Congress, and it was held that there could be no recovery against him alone.

In Fertig v. Bucher, 8 Pa. 308, the party who executed the bond expressly stipulated that it should not be delivered until twelve names had been obtained to it, and the agent of the obligee so promised; it was held that the bond remained in the hands of the agent as an escrow, and until the condition was performed there could not be a valid delivery of it.

In Keyser v. Keen, 17 Pa. 327, the bond was prepared for six persons to sign, but was executed by five only. It was found in the possession of the obligee, and it was held that it was not to be implied that it was incomplete and not binding on those who executed it.

Grim v. Jackson Twp. School Directors, 51 Pa. 219, was the case of a joint and several bond prepared for signatures by four persons named, but signed by three only. The absence of the signature of the fourth was held not to be a defense against payment by the three.

To the same point is Simpson v. Board, 74 Pa. 351.

Warfel v. Frantz, 76 Pa. 88, and Keener v. Crago, 81* Pa. 166, are upon all fours with Fertig v. Bucher, supra. There was an express stipulation that the bond was not to be delivered until all had signed.

The evidence shows that it was the intention of Watson to bind his firm as sureties when he went to execute the bond. He expected to sign the firm name for that purpose, but was told that the members of the firm must sign their individual names. As the bond was under seal his signature would have bound himself, but not his firm. He signed his own name with the expectation that his partner would also sign. For some reason he omitted to do so. Does the fact that Watson expected his partner to execute the bond, and that the firm should thus be held, relieve him from liability? We think not. He made no such stipulation or condition at the time. He might have done so, and thus have protected himself under the authority of Fertig v. Bucher and the other cases cited.

When a man signs the firm name to an instrument under seal he always expects to bind his firm. But he does not do so. He binds only himself. The fact that he intended and expected that his partners should be bound equally with himself has never been held to relieve him of individual liability. In what respect does this case differ in principle? And is not Watson in the precise condition as if he had signed the firm name to this bond, intending to bind his firm, yet only binding himself? The argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error while ingenious and plausible, has failed to satisfy us that the court below committed error either in admitting the bond in evidence or in answer to points.

1. On the embezzlement of the money received on a mortgage which was left after paying off prior incumbrances, by a person employed by the mortgagor to procure the money and pay off such incumbrances, and who was also the agent of the lender for the purpose of examining the property, title, etc., although the latter retained his own judgment as to the investment, the mortgagor, who has left the business to the agent without even an inquiry for months, must bear the loss.

2. Agency cannot be proved by the declarations of the alleged agent.

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, for Philadelphia County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action of scire facias sur mortgage. Affirmed.

Defendant defended upon the ground that he had never received the money alleged to have been advanced upon the mortgage. He claimed that he applied to plaintiff's agent, John Ruhl, for a loan which he was to secure by a mortgage; that he signed but did not acknowledge the mortgage and gave it to Ruhl for the procurement of the money; that Ruhl added an acknowledgment, procured the money, placed the mortgage on record, and failed to account for the proceeds. Plaintiff denied that Ruhl was her agent, and alleged that in procuring the loan Ruhl acted solely as the agent of defendant.

The court below directed a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant took this writ.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

There was no evidence that Ruhl, to whose individual order the plaintiff drew his check for $6,500, was the agent of the defendant. Even if he was his agent to draw papers or to ask if the plaintiff would loan the money on the property, this fact would not authorize the plaintiff to pay the principal to him.

agent, wrote to Sergeant, the trustee of several estates, from whom Ruhl had got money on previous occasions, naming the amount wanted, describing the property, its improvements, assessed value, etc., and asking "Shall I take it, and for whose account?" Just what answer was made to this letter does not appear, except briefly in the testimony of Sergeant that he "took the mortgage for the Pepper estate," and by the fact that Sergeant drew his check as trustee of the Pepper estate to the order of Ruhl for the amount required, $6,500, and received from Ruhl the mortgage in suit. Ruhl used $3,500 of the money properly in the extinguishment of a prior mortgage on the property, but embezzled the rest, and the question now to be decided is upon which party shall the loss fall. Ruhl unquestionably was to some extent the agent of both parties, and we are required to look closely into the facts to discover in which capacity he did the fraudulent act. Clearly at the inception of the transaction he was the agent of Cairns. It was an application for money, and made on behalf of Cairns. But more than this, what was to be done with the money when obtained, and by whom? Cairns himself says the prior incumbrances were to be paid off and satisfied, and clearly again this was to be done by Ruhl, for that was in the line of his business as a conveyancer, and Cairns so left it to him, without even an inquiry for a period at least of months.

On the other hand for what purpose was Ruhl the agent of Sergeant? Certainly for the examination of the property, the title, etc. If the property should prove an inadequate security, or if prior judgments or other incumbrances should cut out this mortgage, then the estate would have to bear the loss, for they took the risk of Ruhl's attention to this part of the transaction. But is there any evidence of Ruhl's further agency for the plaintiff? This was the pinch of the case, and on this the learned judge below ruled it. The evidence is very briefly reported in the bill of exceptions, but the most careful examination of it fails to show that Ruhl's agency for the plaintiff extended beyond his duties as a conveyancer in the examination of the titles, etc. The defendant endeavored strenuously to show that Ruhl was the general agent of Sergeant and had handled the money of several estates as such, but the only competent evidence on the subject was the testimony of Sergeant, and that flatly denied the agency. "Ruhl," he says, "never represented me or the estate in investing of perpetuating the fraud should bear the loss. Sergeant or his principal should be responsible for Ruhl's act. But this is a misapplication of the principle. The means of committing the fraud may as well be said to be the mortgage, executed by Cairns and left with Ruhl, and by him delivered in exchange for the check. As already seen Ruhl was Cairns' agent in the application for the money, and was to continue his agent in the use to be made of it. When he brought the mortgage fully executed to Sergeant, the latter was justified in paying for it on delivery. He might have paid for it in cash, and his payment by check to Ruhl's order was not different in effect.

The case turned upon the question of agency, which the double capacity of Ruhl required to be defined with extreme care. The whole evidence not only fails to show that Ruhl was Sergeant's agent in handling the money, but on the contrary shows clearly that he received it as agent for Cairns, and in that capacity embezzled it. The learned judge was therefore right in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Lackawanna County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit to perpetually enjoin defendants from interfering with plaintiffs' use of the entrance, stairs and corridor of the "Library Building," so called, in the City of Scranton. Affirmed.

In 1878, H. B. Phelps, H. S. Pierce and Thomas Dickson were tenants in common of certain land in the City of Scranton, Phelps owning an undivided one half and Pierce and Dickson each an undivided one quarter of the undivided property.

usually selected plans which would satisfactorily accomplish the object, and the block was erected in accordance therewith.

Before work was fairly begun on the building the parties, by deed of partition, conveyed to each other in severalty a portion of the property and a party-wall was placed upon the lines which divided the property of the respective owners, as follows:

A corridor extended through the entire width of the building, on its second floor, and archways were placed in the party walls, and the stairways leading to such floor were placed entirely upon the portions of the land which had been allotted to Phelps and Dickson respectively.

Defendants acquired Phelps' title and proceeded to close the archway leading from Pierce's property to the stairway on their premises, whereupon this suit was brought to enjoin them from doing so.

The case was referred to a master who found that the facts established an irrevocable license by Phelps to Pierce to use the stairways and corridors, and recommended that the preliminary injunction be made perpetual. Upon hearing of exceptions to this report, it was confirmed and a decree entered in accordance with its recommendations.

The opinion of the court below was as follows, and was delivered by ARCHBALD, P. J.:

"To the judges who heard this case it seems to be a very plain one. The clear and undisputed evidence is that the building in question, covering the two lots of land originally in the joint ownership of Mr. Phelps, Mr. Pierce and Mr. Dickson, was built by these three gentlemen upon a common and single plan, and as a single structure. It matters not, so far as we view the case, whether this plan was adopted before or after the deed of partition, or whether or not there was any express agreement with regard to the common use of the stairways. The building was erected by the owners of the land as a whole, each being liable for a proportionate part according to the extent of his ownership. There was but one plan, one act of specifications, one builder and one contract to build; and these were all treated as concerning one single structure, considered, for the time being, as a whole. By the common design of this building, the only access provided for the second and third stories of the Pierce part was by means of the stairways upon the Phelps and Dickson parts, and through the common corridors upon the upper floors. Originally, one of these stairways was to have been half upon the Phelps, and half upon the Pierce, part; but this was changed, at the instance of Mr. Phelps, for the purpose of saving some of the common expense of building, and was concurred in by the others. Mr. Pierce joined in the execution of this common plan, and bore his share of the expense of constructing the building in this way, upon the faith of it. After this the owners of the adjoining parts of the building could not cut off the access provided by the stairways to this part of the building. The master has found that there was an express agreement between Mr. Phelps and Mr. Pierce with regard to the use of the stairways now in question. There is sufficient evidence to sustain this in the testimony of the architect, Mr. Perry. If this be so, Mr. Phelps could not subsequently repudiate or revoke it, after Mr. Pierce, in reliance upon it, had consented to the erection of the building in its present form. So far as it is necessary to the plaintiff's case, we affirm this finding of the master. But, as said at the outset, we do not consider the existence of an express contract essential. The circumstances to which we have referred of themselves clearly raise an equitable estoppel in favor of the one party and against the other. There is no doubt but that the present arrangement of the building was recognized at the time to be for the mutual advantage of all parties concerned; and, so far as it is of such mutual advantage, this advantage cannot be denied by either party to the other. Mr. Pierce, for instance, could not cut off access through the corridors on the second and third floors from the Phelps to the Dickson part, nor vice versa. For the same reason the owners of the Phelps part cannot interfere with the free and common use by the owners and tenants of the Pierce part of the corridors and stairways which happen to be upon their side of the property. The building being cast by common consent in its present permanent form, neither party can revoke the arrangement, upon the faith of which the money of the other has been expended. Each and every part is affected with what, in its nature, is a permanent servitude, so long as the building itself stands. It cannot be changed from its present form, nor the right of common access now provided for be interfered with, at the will of either party, but only by the common consent of all.

"A right of this character, while not strictly an easement, is in the nature of one. It is really a permission or license, express or implied, to use the property of another in a particular manner, or for a particular purpose. Where this permission has led the party to whom it has been given to treat his own property in a way in which he would not otherwise have treated it, as by the erection or construction of permanent improvements thereon, it cannot be recalled to his detriment. Having expended his money upon the faith of it, and not being able to be restored to his original position, equity will not allow the permission to be revoked, in breach of such faith. This has given rise to the doctrine of executed or irrevocable licenses.

This doctrine obtained an early foothold in Pennsylvania, and has been consistently adhered to ever since. It first appears in Le Fevre v. Le Fevre, 4 Serg. & R. 241, and was followed in Rerick v. Kern, 14 Serg. & R. 267; McKellip v. McIlhenny, 4 Watts, 817 and Swartz v. Swartz, 4 Pa. 858,—being possibly carried to its extreme in the latter case.

"The force of these decisions, and their effect upon the present case, have not been met by the learned counsel for the defendants. It may, indeed, be as he suggests, that the doctrine of irrevocable license is principally illustrated in this State by cases which concern water-rights; yet it by no means follows that it is limited to these, or that there can be no case of irrevocable license except where it concerns such a right. There is nothing peculiar to water-rights which confines the doctrine to them. If it were necessary to prove this, an examination of two or three of the later cases would conclusively establish it.

"Thus, in Ebner v. Stichter, 19 Pa. 19, a right of way over an alley was sustained as an irrevocable license, where one party had made alterations and improvements on his adjoining property upon the faith of a mutual understanding as to the use of such alley with the adjoining owner.

"In Cumberland Valley R. Co. v. McLanahan, 59 Pa. 23, part of a warehouse had been built by the railroad company upon a corner of land which subsequently vested in the plaintiff. In consideration of this circumstance, the company had conceded a right of way over its own land to the owner of the property. The deed which conveyed to the plaintiff the land in dispute, upon which the corner of the warehouse stood, recited the grant of this right of way as the consideration for having built over upon the adjoining land. The plaintiff, after the conveyance to him, made use of this right of way. It was said, with respect to this, by Sharswood, J.: 'If the plaintiff below, with full knowledge of such grant having been made, whether by George Chambers alone, or in conjunction with the executors of McCulloh, availed himself of and enjoyed the right of way which was the consideration of the grant, it was evidence which ought to have been submitted to the jury of a ratification by him of the license, on the faith of which valuable improvements had been made by the grantees, and therefore not within the Statute of Frauds and Irrevocable; and subsequent ratification by parol must be held to be equivalent to a precedent authority.'

"In Thompson v. McElarny, 82 Pa. 174, the license claimed was the right to cast sawdust into a stream upon which the plaintiff was a lower riparian owner. It was shown that the defendant, Thompson, had been induced to put his mill where it was, and in a different place from what he had intended, at the suggestion of one Beckwith, under whom plaintiff claimed, upon the express agreement that he was to have the privilege of casting his sawdust into the stream. There were other considerations which entered into the agreement, which had been fully complied with on the part of the defendant. In discussing the application of the doctrine of irrevocable license to the case in hand, it is said by Woodward, J.: 'The ground was cases quoted could therefore have no application. It was said that "Thompson proposed to build the mill at all events, and did build on his own land. The mill could be enjoyed as well, and be of as much use to him, at one place as at the other." That is hardly so, for the change caused the very embarrassment in disposing of the mill-waste against which it was the object of the agreement to provide. Suppose a man, having selected a site for a building, changes it, and builds his house adjoining that of a neighbor, at the latter's invitation. In doing this he closes up the windows on one side of the neighbor's house. Is it possible that at the neighbor's death his heirs or alienees may enforce the destruction of the builder's house by setting up the doctrine of ancient lights? Or suppose the offered use of a right of way were the motive of the change. Could the neighbor's heirs or alienees oust the builder from the enjoyment of the right because he possessed, by the agreement, only an easement resting in parol grant?

"We have here a supposititious case, assumed by the court as clearly illustrating the doctrine of irrevocable license, which is on all fours with the case now in hand,—a right of way granted by parol over one man's land to an adjoining owner, who builds on his own land in a different way, that is to say, in a different place, from what he would have built, except for the promise relied upon. The unquestionable right of the latter to the enjoyment of the privilege so acquired is thus advanced to sustain the claim of the defendant to an irrevocable license in that case. The positions are here exactly reversed from that suggested by defendant's counsel. Instead of the doctrine of irrevocable license not being extended to other than cases of water-rights, we have it illustrated by the supposed case of a right of way, and from that carried over and applied to a privilege concerning water. These three cases, therefore, which I have discussed, confirm to its full extent the principle upon which the present case must be decided. There is no way of escaping their effect, or of denying their applicability. They entirely sustain the conclusions of the master, and rule the case in the plaintiff's favor. The defendants are furthermore affected with both actual and constructive notice of the right to which the plaintiff lays claim. Not only were they directly notified of its existence, but they could not use their eyes without having it plainly called to their attention. It was an evident servitude existing over the one building, in favor of the other, and arising out of the permanent form in which the building had been constructed. They were thus put upon such inquiry as would have elucidated the facts upon which the plaintiff now justly relies, and are bound thereby."

From that judgment defendants took this appeal.

Johnson v. Stillman, 29 Miss. 98.

To give rise to an estoppel, it is essential that a person is misled to his injury, and even this is not sufficient to support an equitable estoppel. To do this the injury must be of such a character that it cannot be compensated in damages.

Luft v. McCruly, 58 Pa. 204.

A person who has merely omitted to do a thing can be placed in status quo. In this case all that is needed is to supply the omission, put the stairway in. And while the Phelps estate may have to answer in damages for the cost of so doing, neither Phelps nor his grantees are estopped.

See Jackson & B. Co. v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 11 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 380; Wells v. Frost, 4 Sandf. Ch. 72.

In the case in hand the contract is not clearly proved, either as regards its existence, its terms, its subject matter, its consideration or its duration. The evidence nowhere shows the expenditure of a single dollar on the faith of the contract. In case the contract was not enforced the plaintiff would not be injured, or if injured such injury could be adequately compensated in damages. These facts take the case out of Le Fevre v. Le Fevre, 4 Serg. & R. 241 and that class of cases.

See Hoyt v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 51 Pa. 470; Jackson & B. Co. v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. supra; Mott v. Clark, 9 Pa. 404.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.).

Trustees, etc., of the TOWN OF BROOKHAVEN, Appls.,

v.

Egbert T. SMITH et al., Respts.

(118 N. Y. 634.)

1. Where the inhabitants of a town voted and agreed that a person might purchase from the Indians, and peaceably enjoy, certain tracts of land, on his acquainting them of an intent to purchase them, and requiring to know whether the town laid any claim thereto or not, and in the following year, when a patent obtained by him was publicly read, voted and agreed to acquiesce in the limits and bounds of his patent, and the privileges therein contained, the town is estopped from claiming many years afterward that it had title to the lands purchased by him when he obtained this patent.

2. A false representation or concealment of material facts, or a design to mislead, is not necessary to constitute an equitable estoppel by an act which was voluntary and calculated to mislead, and actually has misled another acting in good faith.

3. If one is induced to purchase land by the acts or representations of another designed to influence his conduct, and creating a reasonable belief on his part, under which he acts, that he is thereby acquiring a valid title to the same, the party who thus has influenced him is estopped from setting up his own title, existing at the time of the purchase, against that of the purchaser.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Suffolk Circuit entered upon a verdict directed for defendants in an action to recover possession of certain land covered by water. Affirmed.

Statement by Brown, J.:

This action is in the nature of ejectment to recover land under water of a part of Great South Bay of Long Island.

The plaintiffs' title rests upon two colonial charters granted to the inhabitants and freeholders of the Town of Brookhaven.

NORM.—Equitable estoppel.

Equitable estoppel consists in holding for truth a representation acted upon, when the person making it seeks to deny its truth and to deprive the other party of the benefit obtained. Crane's App. 8 Cent. Rep. 176, 177, 116 Pa. 232.

It is founded on deceit, and has its justification in the duty of courts to prevent the accomplishment of fraud. The same rule applies whether the application of the doctrine be sought in a court of chancery or of law. Laub v. Trowbridge, 71 Iowa, 306; Milliken v. Dockray, 5 New Eng. Rep. 861, 80 Me. 82.

Where a person tacitly encourages an act to be done, he cannot afterwards exercise his legal right in opposition to such consent, if his conduct induced the other party to change his position, so that he will be peculiarly prejudiced. Swain v. Seaman, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 254 (19 L. ed. 554).

So when a person encourages or induces another to buy an estate, he is estopped from thereafter setting up any prior claim he may have had. Batcliff v. Bellfonte Iron Works Co. 10 Ky. L. Rep. 643.

An estoppel in pais arises where one is prejudiced by the wilful act or declaration of another upon whose conduct the former has rightfully acted. Ensel v. Levy, 46 Ohio St. 255.

The acts and admissions of a party operate against him where, in good conscience and honest dealing, he ought not to be permitted to gainsay them. Laub v. Trowbridge, supra.

When an act is done or a statement made by a party, which cannot be contradicted without fraud on his part and injury to others, whose conduct has been influenced by the act or omission, the character of estoppel will attach to what would otherwise be a mere matter of evidence. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Slee, 10 West. Rep. 156, 123 Ill. 87.

It is of the essence of an estoppel in pais that the party having authority to act in the matter has knowingly done an act to influence the conduct of the other, and that the other has acted on the faith of that act. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Belleville, 10 West. Rep. 608, 122 Ill. 376; Columbus v. Columbus Street R. Co. 10 West. Rep. 440, 45 Ohio St. 98; Lux v. Haggins, 60 Cal. 256.

Declarations or admissions, express or implied, made for the purpose of influencing the conduct of another, if the designed effect ensues, are conclusive upon the party making them; but an estoppel, being in its nature defensive, will not be used to effectuate a gain, and will not be enforced further than is requisite to protection from injury. Adler v. Pin, 80 Ala. 361.

Inducing another to occupy a disadvantageous position.

The doctrine of estoppel in pais is applicable to one who has induced another to occupy a position which he otherwise would not. Burke v. Grant, 3 West. Rep. 884, 116 Ill. 124; Brooke v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 125, 108 Pa. 529; Hedgpeeth v. Rose, 95 N. C. 41; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Doster, 108 U. S. 80 (37 L. ed. 66).

An estoppel results from conduct which was intended to induce, and has induced, another to act to his disadvantage. Tyler v. Odd Fellows Mut. Relief Assn. 5 New Eng. Rep. 136, 145 Mass. 134; Adams v. Rockwell, 16 Wend. 318; Christianson v. Linford, 3 Robt. 225.

The act or statement relied upon as an estoppel must have induced action, and the acting party must be injured by repudiation. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Slee, 10 West. Rep. 154, 123 Ill. 87; Wells v. Austin, 4 New Eng. Rep. 799, 59 Vt. 157; Seekel v. Norman, 71 Iowa, 264.

The first was granted March 7, 1666, by Governor Nicolls, and conveyed "all that tract of land which already hath been, or that hereafter shall be purchased for and on behalf of the said Town, whether from the native Indian proprietors or others within the bounds and limits hereafter set forth and expressed."

The said tract extended "north to the Sound, and south to the sea or main ocean," and included the greater part of the large body of water lying on the south side of Long Island and known as the Great South Bay.

The second charter was granted by Governor Dongan, December 27, 1686, and was confirmatory of the Nicolls charter. It granted the same tract of land, together with "the marshes, swamps, rivers, waters, lakes, ponds, creeks and harbors," etc. "Saving to his most sacred majesty aforesaid, his heirs and successors, all the tracts and necks of land that lieth to the south within the limits and bounds aforesaid that remain unpurchased of the native Indians."

The defendant Smith made his title through two Indian deeds dated respectively April 8, 1692, and April 9, 1693, made to William Smith, defendant's ancestor, the first of which covered the premises in dispute; and a deed or patent from Benjamin Fletcher, captain-general and governor-in-chief of the Province of New York, to William Smith, dated October 9, 1693.

He further introduced in evidence, in support of his title, the following extracts from the public records of the town:

"TOWN AND WILLIAM SMITH.

"At a town meeting, upon the 28th day of March, 1693, Col. William Smith, of Brookhaven, did then and there acquaint the Town, as he did before, that with the governor's license he had purchased, and intended to pur-

Where one by his words or wilful conduct or by negligence causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief so as to alter his own previous position, the former is estopped from denying the existence of that state of facts. Tousley v. Board of Education, 39 Minn. 419; Humphreys v. Finch, 97 N. C. 803.

What I induce my neighbor to regard as true is the truth, as between us, if he has been misled by my asseveration. Kirk v. Hamilton, 102 U. S. 76 (23 L. ed. 82).

So one who induces another to purchase land by telling him that the vendor can make a good title is bound by those representations, and cannot thereafter claim that he himself had a right to the land as against the vendor. Shuford v. Shingler, 30 S. C. 612; Greer v. Greer, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 330.

One inducing another to purchase land of which he is the true owner, although ignorant thereof, is estopped from setting up his title. Putnam v. Tyler, 10 Cent. Rep. 752, 117 Pa. 570.

Actual fraud not an essential element.

Although fraud may be, and often is, an ingredient in the conduct of the party estopped, it is, nevertheless, not an essential element. See note to Galbraith v. Lunsford (Tenn.) 1 L. R. A. 522; Waring v. Somborn, 32 N. Y. 804.

It is sufficient if the conduct of the party induced another to act upon it, and that the other did act upon it. See 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 804-807, criticizing the case of Brant v. Virginia Coal & Iron Co. 96 U. S. 326 (23 L. ed. 927).

It is not necessary that there should be a prior positive fraud, to create an equitable estoppel. Kelley v. Fisk, 9 West. Rep. 189, 110 Ind. 552.

The doctrine of equitable estoppel does not depend upon any fraudulent design, but it is applied to avert injurious consequences from having been misled by the conduct of another. Hill v. Blackwelder, 113 Ill. 238; Chapman v. Chapman, 59 Pa. 214; Miller v. Miller, 60 Pa. 16; Favill v. Roberts, 50 N. Y. 222; Tilton v. Nelson, 27 Barb. 596; Wells v. Pierce, 27 N. H. 503; Wilcox v. Iowa Wesleyan University, 32 Iowa, 387; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 193, 387.

He who advises and encourages another to buy of a third person a right to which he has himself a title is postponed in equity to such purchaser. Hart v. Giles, 67 Mo. 180.

He will be bound by the sale, and neither he nor his privies will be at liberty to dispute the validity of vendee's title. Barham v. Turbeville, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 439, 37 Am. Dec. 784.

chase, diverse tracts of land unpurchased of the Indian natives by the Town, and within the limits of their patent and reserved to their majesties by their patent, and did require to know whether the Town laid any claim to the same or not and whether they were content that be, the said Smith, should purchase and peaceably enjoy the same. Voted and agreed that the above said Col. Smith may purchase and peaceably enjoy as aforesaid.

"At a meeting of the trustees of the freeholders and commonalty of the Town of Brookhaven, upon the 27th day of November, 1698, at the same time Col. William Smith did cause his patent to be read before the trustees above said, and each and every of them did declare that they had nothing to object against the limits, bounds, powers, privileges within the said patent contained.

"Upon the 1st day of May, 1694, being election day, Col. William Smith caused his patent to be publicly read before the freeholders of the Town. It is voted and agreed by the trustees and freeholders above said that they do, on the Town's behalf, agree and forever acquiesce in the limits and bounds of the said patent, and do assent and consent to the powers, privileges and immunities and exemptions therein contained, so far as the same may anyways concern the Township, saving to the several particular inhabitants such shares of meadow at South Bay by them unsold, as the same was laid out to them within the limits and bounds aforesaid."

On September 21, 1698, the said William Smith and the trustees of the Town entered into an agreement in writing which recited the purchase by Smith, with the consent of the Town, of certain tracts of land within the limits of the Town's patent, and which had never been purchased by the Town from the Indians, and then fixed and defined the north boundary line between Smith's lands and the lands of the Town.

The defendant, Egbert P. Smith, succeeded to Col. William Smith's title. The other defendants are lessees of Egbert Smith.

The trial court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, to which the plaintiff excepted.

The other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Nicoll Floyd, for appellants:

In order to an equitable estoppel or estoppel by conduct the following elements should concur:

1. There must have been a false representation or concealment of material facts.
2. The representation must have been made with the knowledge of the facts.
3. The party to whom it was made must have been ignorant of the truth of the matter.

Mr. Wilmot M. Smith for respondents.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This court decided in Brookhaven v. Strong, 60 N. Y. 56, and again in Hand v. Newton, 99 N. Y. 89, that under the Town's charters it had title to the land under the waters of the navigable bays and harbors within the limits defined in those instruments. These cases, however, afford no aid to the solution of the question now presented, for the reason that in the first action the patent under which defendant claims was a part of the Town's title to the land then in dispute, and the second involved the title to land under water on the north side of the island entirely outside of the limits of defendant's grant.

The learned counsel for the appellants claims that the patent to William Smith did not in terms convey any part of the bay. This proposition cannot be sustained.

The grant recites the issuing of a warrant to the surveyor-general of the province to survey and lay out several necks and tracts of land, beach, bay, etc., situated on the south side of the island, formerly called Long Island, etc. That said surveyor-general had surveyed and laid out "said necks and tracts of land, . . . bay and island within said bay bounded westward from the main sea or ocean," etc. It then grants to Col. William Smith and his heirs the "afore-recited necks and tracts of land within the respective bounds before mentioned, together with the waters, rivers, lakes, creeks, harbors, bays, islands, fishing, fouling, etc., and all rights . . . privileges . . . and appurtenances whatsoever to the aforesaid necks and tracts of land, bay, beach and islands within said bay," etc.

It will thus be seen that the bay is granted by express terms. The bay is not described as appurtenant to the neck and tracts of land, but the bay is conveyed with all the benefits and privileges appertaining thereto.

Almost identical language is used in the Dongan Charter to the Town, and this court held it sufficient to convey the title to land under water (Brookhaven v. Strong, supra), and that decision must control the construction of the grant to Smith.

The land in dispute being therefore within the grant to William Smith, I think the case presents all the elements of an equitable estoppel against the Town. It is not necessary, as is claimed in one of the briefs submitted to us by the appellant, to constitute an equitable

Bank v. Com. Nat. Bank, 60 N. Y. 688-689, Casco Bank v. Kene, 53 Me. 108.

If those declarations affected the conduct of Smith with reference to the land purchased, so that it would be unjust or injurious now to those who have succeeded him to permit the plaintiff to set up its title contrary to the truth of its declaration, it is sufficient. That which might not amount to an estoppel at the time the declaration is made may become such by ratification or acquiescence. Bigelow, Estop. 5th ed 650; Faxon v. Faxon, 38 Mich. 159.

The authorities in this State are all harmonious on the subject of estoppel in pais.

When a party, either by his declarations or conduct, has induced a third person to act in a particular manner, he will not afterwards be permitted to deny the truth of the admission, if the consequence would be to work an injury to such third person or to someone claiming under him. Wendell v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. Ch. 344, 354, Storrs v. Barker, 8 Johns. Ch. 106, Town v. Needham, 8 Paige, Ch. 543; Dwight v. Odell, 8 Hill, 215, also see dissenting opinion of Judge Bronson, approved in Finnegan v. Carragher, 47 N. Y. 500, Brown v. Sprague, 5 Denio, 545; Plumb v. Cattaraugus Ins. Co. 18 N. Y. 293, Welland Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 9 Wend. 469, Thompson v. Blanchard, 4 N. Y. 203; Continental Nat. Bank v. Com. Nat. Bank, 50 N. Y. 575; Armour v. Mich. Cent. R. Co. 65 N. Y. 111-122; New York Rubber Co. v. Rothery, 107 N. Y. 310-316, 9 Cent. Rep. 627.

Numerous cases where this principle has been applied to real estate are collected in Washburn on Real Property, vol. 8, chap. 11, § 6, to which reference is made. When so applied it is as effectual as a deed would be from the party estopped.

The general rule deduced from all the authorities is that if one is induced to purchase land by the acts or representations of another, designed to influence his conduct, and creating a reasonable belief on his part under which he acts that he is thereby acquiring a valid title to the same, the party who thus has influenced him is estopped from setting up his own title existing at the time of the purchase against that of the purchaser.

The various declarations of the Town through the trustees and the town meetings must be construed as a single representation. They were all in pari materia, and had one purpose, viz., to inform Smith that the Town made no claim to the land he desired to purchase.

The "necks and tracts" of land reserved to the Crown by the Dongan Charter could not be identified except by a declaration by the Town, or through the medium of some legal proceedings against the Town. We have the fact that when the survey had been completed, and embodied in the patent, it was read to the town meeting and approved, and the Town voted "to agree and acquiesce in the bounds of the patent."

It described particularly "the bay," and the patent obligated Smith to pay an annual quit-rent to the Crown.

There can be no reasonable doubt that Smith sought and obtained the resolutions of the town meetings as muniments of his title, and that they were intended by the Town to be only to influence the purchase; and why was the inquiry made and answered?

In the most deliberate manner possible the Town not only disclaimed ownership, but agreed and acquiesced in the purchase, and in the boundaries of the land conveyed.

I am unable to see any distinction to be made between the upland and the bay. Both were conveyed by the same instrument, and the resolution of the town meetings applied as much to one as to the other.

In reliance upon the declaration of the Town, and on the supposition that he had title, Smith entered into possession, and he and his descendants on the faith of these declarations have had undisturbed possession of the land for nearly 200 years. The Town cannot now be permitted to deny the truth of its declaration, and assert its title to the premises in dispute.

To repel, however, the presumption arising from the transactions I have alluded to, so far as it is made applicable to the waters of the bay, the appellant appeals to the acts of the parties under their respective patents, and it is claimed that the evidence shows such user by the Town of the bay as indicates that title thereto was in the Town by the acquiescence of all parties, and that, if the evidence on this branch of the case was not conclusive, it was at least of such a character as to require the submission of the question to the jury.

The application of the rule which denies the right of the appellant to assert at the present time its title to the bay, depends very largely upon its acquiescence in the ownership of Smith and his descendants.

I have assumed such acquiescence in the view I have thus far taken of the case, but if the fact be as claimed by the appellant, the conclusion I have reached probably could not be sustained in the absence of a finding on that question by the jury.

The evidence of the question of user is of two kinds: first, certain resolutions of the trustees of the Town in reference to the control and regulation of fishing in the bay; and, second, acts of the inhabitants of the Town in taking fish and oysters from the bay.

The first covers a period of about ten years only, beginning in 1758 and ending in 1768.

There is no evidence that anyone ever acted under the resolutions of the trustees, and none that they were ever brought to the knowledge of the defendant's ancestors or that he ever heard of them. The evidence that the inhabitants of the Town took fish from the bay is confined mainly to the period between 1869 and 1879, when the Town, under an agreement with the defendant, Egbert P. Smith, controlled the bay.

There are a few instances earlier than 1869, but it was not shown that the persons acted under authority from the Town. I can find no evidence in the case that the defendant Smith, or any of his ancestors, ever, by word or act, admitted the right of the Town to control the fishing in the bay, and in the absence of evidence tending to show that fact, no resolutions passed by the trustees of the Town and no acts of the inhabitants in taking fish from the bay can be regarded as indicative of title in the Town.

was conveyed by the original grant.

We think the evidence fails to show any user of the property in dispute by the Town.

For upwards of sixty years after the grant to William Smith, so far as the case informs us, if there was not absolute acquiescence in Smith's title there was at least no claim or assertion by the Town of a right to control the bay.

The greater part of the bay was during the last century conveyed to the Town by the grandson of the original patentee, and the Town now holds such rights as it has there under those conveyances. In 1862 the Town took from the defendant Egbert F. Smith a deed for the property now in dispute, agreeing in consideration of that conveyance to lease out the privileges in the bay and pay one half the net proceeds to said defendant.

The town records inform us with reference to that conveyance that "Hon. Egbert F. Smith offered to release to the Town all that part of the bay, etc., on the same terms as his ancestor released to the Town the East Bay in 1790, so that hereafter the Town should have control of all the bays on the south side of the island." It was thereupon resolved "to accept

Smith becoming dissatisfied with the agreement and threatening litigation, the agreement was annulled and the property reverted to him. This agreement established a dividing line between the land in dispute and the East Bay.

We think all these transactions from the date of the patent to Col. William Smith to the annulling of the last agreement between the parties, speak one language on the question of title and show acquiescence on the part of the Town in the grant to Smith.

The few resolutions of the board of trustees passed one hundred and fifty years ago, and the few instances of the Town's people asserting a right to fish in the bay, establish only that there was occasional dissatisfaction and a show of resistance to Smith's title. But the right under that title was always maintained and exercised by exacting small payments for individual privileges and by occasional leasing of the bay.

There was on the evidence no question for the jury, and the court rightly disposed of the case on the legal questions alone.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

J. Emmett WELLS, Exr., etc., of Samuel H. Hinsdale, Deceased, Resp't.,

v.
TOWN OF SALINA, Appt.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. Municipalities are not empowered to borrow money for municipal purposes unless expressly authorized to do so by statute, or, in the absence of a statute, unless the power is necessarily implied from some special duty imposed for the discharge of which the power to borrow is not only convenient but necessary.

2. A town in the State of New York has no power to borrow money.

3. The power to "raise" money for municipal purposes does not include the power to borrow.

4. An action cannot be maintained against a town on notes given for money loaned to the town to carry on ordinary litigation, nor does any action lie to recover the money loaned.

(February 24, 1890.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Onondaga Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due upon certain promissory notes given for borrowed money. Reversed.

Statement by Earl, J.:

In the year 1870 the Town of Salina, under chap. 570 of the Laws of 1868, issued its bonds to the amount of $120,000, payable twenty years thereafter, with interest at 7 per cent, payable on the first days of August and February of each year. By the terms of § 4 of the Act of 1868, the railroad commissioner of the Town, an officer created under § 1 of the Act, was required "to report to the board of supervisors of the county wherein said town or village is situated, within three days after the commencement of their regular session in each year, the amount of money required to pay the principal and interest on the bonds thus issued, due or to become due and payable during the next ensuing year, after deducting any sums received as dividends on the stock of said company, held by said town or village, which must be first applied to the payment of such principal and interest; and the said board of supervisors shall thereupon cause to be assessed, levied and collected upon the real and personal property of the said town or village, at the same time and in the same manner as other taxes, such amount of money as shall be thus reported as necessary to pay such principal and interest, and such amount when collected shall be paid to and applied by the commissioners to the payment of the said principal and interest of the bonds aforesaid."

In pursuance of this provision the railroad commissioner of the Town of Salina, with moneys raised for that purpose, paid the interest upon the bonds as it became due to and including August 1, 1880. On December 1, 1880, he presented to the clerk of the board of supervisors a report directed to the board in which, in conformity with the provisions of the Act, he stated the amount required to pay the principal and interest to become due during the next ensuing year. That report was taken by the supervisor of Salina and no action was taken thereon by the board of supervisors. On the 27th of January, 1881, Francis Alvord, who was then supervisor of the Town, and Leman B. Pitcher commenced an action as individuals and taxpayers in behalf of themselves, and all other taxpayers of this Town who might come in and contribute to the expense of the action, against various of the bondholders and the railroad commissioner of the Town to restrain the latter from performing the acts required of him by the Statute, and the former from enforcing their securities. At the same time an injunction was served upon the defendants restraining the railroad commissioner from paying any of the bonds or coupons and from taking any measures for raising money for the payment of such interest. Judgment was demanded in that action, among other things, that the bonds mentioned in the complaint be declared void and surrendered up to be canceled; that all the proceedings for issuing the bonds be adjudged invalid and void; that the Statute under which they were issued be declared unconstitutional and void; that the defendants be enjoined from selling, transferring or disposing of any of said bonds in their possession, custody or control during the pendency of the action and until the further order of the court, without giving to the purchaser or purchasers thereof notice of the pendency of the action.

The next annual meeting of the Town of Salina after the commencement of that action was held on February 15, 1881, and a resolution was there duly adopted which after reciting the commencement of the action by Alvord and Pitcher as taxpayers of the Town of Salina on behalf of themselves and all other taxpayers of the Town who would contribute to the expense of the action, requested, authorized and required the supervisor of the Town, and his successor or successors in office, "to assume the direction and conduct of such action and the prosecution of the same, if permitted by said plaintiffs, and to prosecute the same to a final judgment, and to pay all the expenses of such prosecution, and to employ counsel and to borrow upon the credit of the Town all such sums of money from time to time as may be necessary for the prosecution of said action."

At a town meeting held in February, 1882, another resolution was adopted, "authorizing and requiring the supervisor to borrow on the credit of the Town not to exceed $8,400, the amount so raised by him to be used in his discretion for the payment of the expense already incurred, by the litigation then pending, for the purpose of setting aside and canceling the bonds issued by the Town in aid of the Syracuse Northern Railroad Company, and for the purpose of defending the same against any suit or proceeding which might be brought against the Town; and the town board was authorized and required to put that amount into the abstract of town accounts, to be presented to the board of supervisors at its next annual session, to be levied on the Town with other taxes."

In pursuance of the first resolution, for the

And reasonable doubts as to the existence of authority in such corporations are to be resolved against them. Ibid.

They have no power to make commercial paper of any kind, unless such power is expressly conferred by law or clearly implied from some power expressly given which cannot fairly be exercised without it. Concord v. Robinson, 121 U. S. 165 (30 L. ed. 886).

No implication of such power arises from authority to appropriate and raise by taxation money to aid in the construction of a railroad. Ibid.

On the question whether municipal corporations have power, without legislative authority, to borrow money or to issue notes, bills or other securities of a commercial character, free from equitable defenses in the hands of bona fide holders, the court was equally divided. Nashville v. Ray, 88 U. S. 19 Wall. 488 (22 L. ed. 164); Nashville v. Lindsey ("Mayor v. Lindsey") 88 U. S. 19 Wall. 485 (22 L. ed. 7 L. R. A.

Legislative authority to a city to borrow money on the credit of the city, and to issue bonds therefor, does not authorize the issue of its bonds as a donation to a company or individual, to be used in the improvement of the water power within and near the city. Ottawa v. Carey, supra.

The power given to a city council to borrow money on the credit of the city, and issue their bonds under the seal of the city therefor, does not alone confer authority to subscribe to the stock of a railroad company and issue bonds in payment thereof. Jonesboro v. Cairo & St. L. R. Co. 110 U. S. 192 (28 L. ed. 118).

purpose of raising money to defray the expenses of that action, the supervisor, on behalf of the Town, made three promissory notes, one dated March 9, 1881, for $1,500, one dated December 21, 1881, for $500, and one dated December 31, 1881, for $1,500; and in pursuance of both resolutions he made another note for $500, dated April 29, 1882. Upon these notes $4,000 was borrowed of the plaintiff's testator, Samuel H. Hinsdale, and the money so borrowed was used to defray the expenses of the action named. That action was brought to trial and the complaint was dismissed. An appeal was then taken on behalf of the plaintiff to the general term of the supreme court where the judgment was affirmed, and a further appeal was then taken to this court where the judgment was finally affirmed. Alvord v. Syracuse Sav. Bank, 98 N. Y. 599.

Thereafter this action was commenced against the Town to recover on the four notes made on behalf of the Town by its supervisor as above stated, and to recover the money loaned to the Town thereon. The action was put at issue and brought to trial before a judge without a jury who ordered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant appealed to the general term and from affirmance there to this court.

Mr. Louis Marshall, for appellant:

There can be no recovery in this action upon the promissory notes executed by Alvord, as supervisor, or even for money had and received, since the resolutions under which they purport to have been executed, provided that the Town should borrow money upon its credit, for the prosecution of the action, and no statutory authority exists which empowers the Town to pledge its credit by means of a promissory note. A municipality, and a fortiori a town, has no implied power to borrow money, or to issue negotiable paper.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action commenced by Alvord and Pitcher, if successful, would necessarily have inured to the benefit of the Town and all its taxpayers, and we will therefore assume that the electors of the Town at the town meetings in 1881 and 1883 had the power to direct the supervisor, with the consent of the plaintiffs in that action, to assume the control, direction and prosecution thereof on behalf of the Town, and that that action may therefore be treated as if it had been actually commenced in the name of the Town or its supervisor. We will also assume that the electors at the town meetings had the power to direct money to be raised for prosecuting that action, and furthermore that the $4,000 was borrowed to defray the expenses of that action and was actually used for that purpose, and yet we are constrained to hold that this action cannot be maintained.

Business corporations, unless restrained by their charters, possess the power to borrow money and issue securities therefor. Generally they could not carry on their authorized and legitimate business without such a power, and hence it must be presumed that the Legislature intended that they should possess it. But towns and other municipal corporations are organized for governmental purposes, and their powers are limited and defined by the statutes under which they are constituted. They possess only such powers as are expressly conferred or necessarily implied. They are clothed with the power of taxation, and can thus raise all the money needed for ordinary municipal purposes, and until the money can thus be raised, as it can be at brief intervals, experience has demonstrated their ability to obtain upon credit all the materials and services needed without a resort to loans of money upon credit. It is the general, if not the universal, law of this country, and of England, that municipalities are not empowered to borrow money for municipal purposes, unless expressly authorized to do so by statute, or in the absence of a statute, unless the power is necessarily implied from some special duty imposed, for the discharge of which the power to borrow is not only convenient but necessary.

We do not find in the statutes of this State that the power to borrow money has been expressly conferred upon towns, or is necessarily implied. This, we think, will clearly appear from a brief examination of the statutes. It is provided in part 1, chap. 11, title 1, art. 1, of the Revised Statutes, that "no town shall possess or exercise any corporate powers, except such as are enumerated in this chapter, or shall be especially given by law, or shall be necessary to the exercise of the powers so enumerated or given." Among the powers enumerated are the following: "To make such contracts, and to purchase and hold such personal property, as may be necessary to the exercise of its corporate or administrative powers." This provision clearly does not authorize the borrowing of money upon the credit of the Town, unless it can be shown that such borrowing was necessary "to the exercise of its corporate or administrative powers." In title 2, art. 1, of the same chapter, it is provided that the electors of a town at the annual town meeting shall have power "to direct the institution or defense of suits at law or in equity, in all controversies between such town and corporations, individuals or other towns;" and "to direct such sum to be raised in such town for prosecuting or defending such suits, as they may deem necessary." What is here meant by the word "raised?" It certainly does not mean "borrowed," and evidently means raised by taxation. In the same article it is provided that electors, at a town meeting, shall have power "to direct such sum to be raised in such town for the support of common schools for the then ensuing year, as they may deem necessary;" "to make such provisions and allow such rewards for the destruction of noxious weeds as they may deem necessary, and to raise money therefor;" "to direct such sum to be raised in such town for the support of the poor for the ensuing year, as they may deem necessary. And every town may raise any money that may be necessary to defray any charges that may exist against the overseers of the poor of such town;" and special town meetings may be "called for the purpose of raising money for the support of common schools, or of the poor," "to vote on the question of raising money for the construction and maintenance of any bridge or bridges," and "for the purpose of deliberating in regard to the institution or defense of suits, or the raising of moneys therefor."

In pt. 1, chap. 10, title 1, art. 1, of the Revised Statutes, it is provided that, "the commissioners of highways of each town shall deliver to the supervisor of such town a statement of the improvements necessary to be made on the roads and bridges, together with the probable expense thereof, which supervisor shall lay the same before the board of supervisors at their next meeting. The board of supervisors shall cause the amount so estimated to be assessed, levied and collected in such town in the same manner as other town charges; but the moneys to be raised in any such town shall not exceed in any year the sum of $250;" and in chapter 274 of the Laws of 1832, § 1, it is provided that "whenever the commissioners of highways of any town in this State shall be of opinion that the sum of $250 as now allowed by law will be insufficient to pay the expenses actually necessary for the improvement of roads and bridges, it shall be lawful for such commissioners to apply in open town meeting for a vote authorizing such additional sum to be raised as they may deem necessary for the purpose aforesaid, not exceeding $250 in addition to the sum now allowed by law;" and § 5 provides that, "if any town shall at an annual meeting have already voted to raise a sum exceeding $250 for the purposes aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the board of supervisors of the county in which such town is situated to assess, levy and collect the sum so voted to be raised upon said town."

In chapter 805 of the Laws of 1840 the boards of supervisors are authorized and directed to cause "to be levied and raised" the amounts audited and allowed by boards of town auditors.

In chapter 197 of the Laws of 1847 it is provided that "the board of supervisors in any county may, in their discretion, cause any money, or any portion thereof voted by towns, before the passage of this Act, for building town houses, to be raised in said town for such purpose."

In chapter 518 of the Laws of 1872, chapter 410 of the Laws of 1874, chapter 554 of the Laws of 1880, and in numerous other Statutes, the word "raise" or "raised" is used in the same sense; and so far as we can discover it is never used in the sense of "borrow" or "borrowed." The power to raise money for municipal purposes, it is believed, never means a power to borrow unless there is other language qualifying or extending its meaning. Sletton v. Kempton, 18 Mass. 272; Frost v. Belmont, 6 Allen, 152; Claffin v. Hopkinton, 4 Gray, 502; Minot v. West Roxbury, 112 Mass. 1; Mead v. Acton, 139 Mass. 841.

There was not only no express authority conferred upon the Town to borrow this money, but it did not possess the power by necessary implication. The credit of the Town would have been sufficient for the prosecution of the taxpayer's action, until money could have been raised to meet the expenses by the ordinary mode of taxation.

We have assumed that the maintenance of that action was a town purpose, and that the expense thereof was a town charge; but the expense was to be met like all other town charges. Towns have no power to borrow money simply because it is useful and intended to pay a town charge. The expenses of the town poor and of town bridges and of town officers, are all town charges, and yet no one would contend that the Town could borrow money to meet these charges instead of meeting them in the mode prescribed by statute by taxation.

In pt. 1, chap. 11, title 6, of the Revised Statutes, it is provided that "the moneys necessary to defray the town charges of each town shall be levied on the taxable property in the town in the manner prescribed in this Act."

It is the policy of the laws that town charges shall be met by annual recurring taxation, and thus extravagance and improvidence are in some degree checked, as those who create town charges, or are the taxpayers when they arise, must bear the burden of taxation to meet them. It is quite easy for the taxpayers of to-day to create a debt which they are not to feel, and which the taxpayers of the future are to discharge. The system of laws relating to towns requires that all bills for moneys expended, or materials furnished, or services rendered to the town, shall be verified and presented to the board of town auditors and audited by them, and then enforced by warrants of the board of supervisors, against the taxpayers of the town. This whole system would be subverted if towns could borrow money upon credit to meet town charges. Then the money would have to be repaid, whether the town had had the benefit thereof or not, and the wise provisions of the statutes to secure economy and safety by the audit of accounts would be entirely frustrated.

The danger of allowing money to be borrowed on the credit of the town for such a town purpose, as we have here is quite clearly illustrated in this case. Here the sum of $8,400 was authorized to be borrowed to carry on an ordinary litigation, and $500 was paid to the attorney long before the trial of the action, and thereafter $3,000 more was paid to him for his services and expenses, and there remains still a balance due. The bills for services and expenses have never been audited or allowed in the mode prescribed by the statutes. There was no proof upon the trial that the money borrowed was actually needed for the prosecution of that action, or that it was prudently, honestly or wisely used. But even if we should assume that it had been sufficiently established that the Town had the full benefit of the money thus borrowed, that would not authorize the maintenance of this action.

If a town could be made liable for money borrowed simply because it had been applied for town purposes, then the entire system for the audit and allowance of town charges would be overturned. Even if the plaintiff's testator by the payment of the expenses of that litigation became the equitable assignee of the bills representing such expenses, and might have taken and presented those bills for audit to the board of town auditors, yet he never did so. He did not bring his action upon the theory that he was an equitable assignee of those bills, and he gave no proof which entitled him to recover as an equitable assignee, and the case was not tried upon that theory.

Our conclusion therefore is that upon the facts as they appear in this record the complaint should have been dismissed; and for this conclusion there is abundance of authority.

In Hanger v. Des Moines, 52 Iowa, 193, it was said: "It is well settled that a municipal corporation can exercise only such powers as are expressly granted by statute, and such as are necessarily and fairly implied in, or incident to, those conferred by express grant and those essential to the declared object and purpose of the corporation." And to the same effect are the following authorities: Minot v. West Roxbury, supra; Anthony v. Adams, 1 Met. 284; Parsons v. Goheen, 11 Pick. 396; Lemon v. Newton, 184 Mass. 478; Cornell v. Guilford, 1 Denio, 510; Richmond Co. v. Ellis, 59 N. Y. 620.

In Hackettstown ads. Swackhamer, 87 N. J. L. 191, it was held that municipal corporations, in the absence of a specific grant of power, do not in general possess the capacity to borrow money, and that a note given for an unauthorized loan cannot be enforced, although the money borrowed has been expended for municipal purposes. Beasley, Ch. J., writing the opinion, said: "I am at a loss to perceive how it can be inferred that a power to borrow money is an appendage to the usual franchises given to municipal corporations. Such a right cannot, in any reasonable sense, be said to be necessary within the meaning of that term as already defined. Under ordinary circumstances, it is not certainly indispensable, as common experience demonstrates. In the great majority of instances the municipal affairs are, with ease and completeness, transacted without it. . . . My remarks are to be restricted to that class of cases where charters are granted containing nothing more than the usual franchises incident to municipal corporations, and under such conditions it seems clear to me that the power to borrow money is not to be deduced. I have already said that it does not appear to be a necessary incident to the powers granted, for such powers can be readily and efficiently executed in its absence. It would be to fly in the face of all experience to claim that the ordinary municipal operations cannot be efficiently carried on except with the assistance of borrowed capital. Without any help of this kind it is well known that our towns and cities have long been, and are now being, improved and governed. For the attainment of these ends it has not generally been found necessary to resort to loans of money. The supplies derived annually from taxation have been found amply sufficient for these purposes. Consequently I am unable to perceive any necessity to borrow money, under these conditions, from which the gift of such power to borrow is to be implied. It undoubtedly is clear that if, as has been asserted, the ends of the municipal charter can be conveniently reached without a resort to the device of raising moneys by loan, there is not the least legal basis for a claim of the power to obtain funds in that way. Granted the fact that the charter can be executed with reasonable ease and with completeness, the conclusion is inevitable that the power in question cannot be called into existence by intendment, and as I claim the fact to exist, I must of necessity reject the right of implication in question."

In Ketchum v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 856, Selden, J., writing the opinion of the court, said: "It is true the power to contract to pay A $10,000 at the end of the year for doing certain work, and the power to borrow $10,000 of B upon a credit of a year, for the purpose of paying A for doing the work, might seem at first view to be substantially identical. The amount is the same and the time of payment the same; the credit only is different. A little examination, however, will show that there is a very material difference between the two. If the power of the corporation to use its credit is limited to contracting directly for the accomplishment of the object authorized by law, then the avails or consideration of the debt created cannot be diverted to any illegitimate purpose. The contract not only creates the fund, but secures its just appropriation. On the contrary, if the money may be borrowed the corporation will be liable to repay it, although not a cent may ever be applied to the object for which it was avowedly obtained. It may be borrowed to build a market and appropriated to build a theatre, and yet the corporation would be responsible for the debt. The lender is in no way accountable for the use made of the money. It is plain, therefore, that if the policy of limiting the powers and expenditures of corporations to the objects contemplated by their charters is to be carried out, their right to incur debts for those objects must be strictly confined to contracts which tend to their direct accomplishment. . . . No one can fail to see that to concede to corporations the power to borrow money for any purpose would be entirely subversive of the principle which would limit their operations to legitimate objects."

In Starin v. Genoa, 28 N. Y. 489, Lott, J., writing the opinion, said: "The towns of this State have not the general power to borrow money, nor are their officers, in the exercise of their ordinary duties, authorized to issue bonds or any other evidence of indebtedness in the name of the towns represented by them for loans or other debts contracted or incurred on their behalf."

In Parker v. Saratoga Co., 106 N. Y. 392, 9 Cent. Rep. 263, Andrews, J., said: "The contention that boards of supervisors have no inherent power to borrow money or to issue negotiable paper, accords with the general understanding and with the tenor of the adjudged cases and the course of legislation, which presupposes the necessity of express legislative sanction in order to justify the exercise of this authority. In this State the powers of boards of supervisors are not only the subject of express affirmative definition, but for the purpose of confining the action of these bodies to the exercise of enumerated powers, it is declared that 'no county shall possess or exercise any corporate powers, except such as are enumerated or shall be specially given by law, or shall be necessary to the exercise of the powers so enumerated or given.' The power of borrowing money is incident to the powers of a business corporation, unless excluded by its charter. Boards of supervisors have the recourse of taxation for the raising of money for county purposes. The power to borrow money is not necessary to the execution of powers expressly given. But the denial of this power to these quasi public corporations also stands strongly upon considerations of public policy, and the doctrine that they have no implied power to borrow money is an important safeguard to the protection of political communities against the creation of ruinous liabilities through the action of incapable, negligent or unfaithful public agents. We concur, therefore, with the proposition that the power of the board of supervisors to extend the original debt by means of new loans, or by renewals of prior obligations, if it existed, must be found in the statute, given either expressly or by implication."

In Nashville v. Ray, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 468 [22 L. ed. 164], Mr. Justice Bradley wrote an opinion in which Justices Miller, Davis and Field concurred, in which he said: "A municipal corporation is a subordinate branch of the domestic government of a State. It is instituted for public purposes only, and has none of the peculiar qualities and characteristics of a trading corporation instituted for purposes of private gain, except that of acting in a corporate capacity. Its object, its responsibilities and its powers are different. As a local governmental institution it exists for the benefit of the people within its corporate limits. The Legislature invests it with such powers as it deems adequate to the ends to be accomplished. The power of taxation is usually conferred for the purpose of enabling it to raise the necessary funds to carry on the city government, and to make such public improvements as it is authorized to make. As this is a power which immediately affects the entire constituency of the municipal body which exercises it, no evil consequences are likely to ensue from its being conferred, although it is not unusual to affix limits to its exercise for any single year. The power to borrow money is different. When this is exercised the citizens are immediately affected only by the benefit arising from the loan; its burden is not felt until afterwards. Such a power does not belong to a municipal corporation as an incident to its creation. To be possessed it must be conferred by legislation, either express or implied. It does not belong, as a mere matter of course, to local governments to raise loans. Such governments are not created for any such purpose. Their powers are prescribed by their charters, and those charters provide the means for exercising the powers; and the creation of specific means excludes others. Indebtedness may be incurred to a limited extent in carrying out the objects of the corporation. Evidence of such indebtedness may be given to the public creditors. But they must look to and rely on the legitimate mode of raising the funds for its payment. That mode is taxation. Our system of local and municipal government is copied, in its general features, from that of England. No evidence is adduced to show that the practice of borrowing money has been used by the cities and towns of that country without an Act of Parliament authorizing it. We believe no such practice has ever obtained. . . . If in the exercise of their important trusts the power to borrow money and to issue bonds or other commercial securities is needed, the Legislature can easily confer it under the proper limitations and restraints and with proper provisions for future payment. Without such authority it cannot be legally exercised."

In Atty-Gen. v. Lichfield, 13 Sim. 547, the case was one, where £200 were borrowed of one Mallett and used for the ordinary expenses of the corporation; and it was held that the corporation had no authority to borrow money, and its treasurer was restrained from paying out of the funds of the corporation the money thus borrowed.

To the same effect are the following textbooks: Dillon, Mun. Bonds, 13, 14; Burroughs, Pub. Securities, § 177; Jones, Railroad Securities, §§ 222, 283; Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1530.

In the latter authority the learned author says: "But there is a fundamental difference between contracting a debt to one person and borrowing money from another to pay it. It may be convenient to do so, but it cannot be necessary, and the power to contract a debt to A cannot, by any reasonable intendment, be construed into a power to borrow money from B. In the one case the application of the credit is secured to the advancement of the authorized object, while money borrowed is liable to be lost, to be squandered or to be diverted to illegitimate purposes."

was held that where a municipal charter prohibits its officers from contracting on its behalf for the purchase of materials, save in cases and in a manner specified, the municipality is neither liable upon a contract made by an official in violation of, or without a compliance with the requirements of the charter, nor can the value of materials furnished under the contract be recovered upon any implied liability. In that case Judge Folger said: "It may be that where a municipality has come into the possession of the money or the property of a person without his voluntary, intentional action concurring therein, the law will fix a liability and imply a promise to repay or return it."

In Dickinson v. Poughkeepsie, 75 N. Y. 65, it was held that a contract for the supply of water in the City of Poughkeepsie was unauthorized and void, and that being void when executed its execution did not confer upon the contractor any right of action thereunder, and that no recovery thereon could be had upon a quantum meruit. Judge Hand there said: "If the execution of a contract, the making of which is prohibited as against public policy, absolutely cures its invalidity, a mere continuance in violation of law would have certainly a strange result. It is difficult to see what use or force there could be in such prohibitions, so general as to municipalities, and so much a part of our policy in this State, if the consummation of their violation brings with it the protection of the law and a right of action for payment upon the void contract."

The money for which the plaintiff here seeks to recover was not taken from his testator against his will. On the contrary his testator delivered it to Alvord knowing, as we must assume, that he had no right to borrow it on behalf of the Town, and that he had no agency on its behalf in reference thereto. This is not, therefore, like a case where the money or property of one is taken against his will without authority of law or in violation of law, and applied to the use or benefit of a municipality.

We have regarded this as a case of great public importance, and we have therefore given it very careful consideration. The extended citations from authorities of acknowledged weight, and from the opinions of judges of great repute, furnish ample reasons for the conclusion we have reached. There is no possible ground which we can perceive for the maintenance of this action, and it is better that the litigation should end here.

The judgment of the General Term, and that entered at the Trial Term should therefore be reversed, and the complaint dismissed, with costs.

All concur, except Ruger, Ch. J., and Andrews, J., who take no part.

REPORT from the Supreme Judicial Court for Middlesex County (Knowlton, J.) for the opinion of the full court of a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the delivery to plaintiff of all the funds, books, etc., in possession of defendants as trustees of the Cary Library. Dismissed.

In 1867 Maria Cary addressed to the selectmen of Lexington the following letter:

Brooklyn, N. Y., December 10, 1867.

To the Selectmen of the Town of Lexington.
Gentlemen:

Having a regard for my native place and wishing to promote its welfare by diffusing knowledge among its inhabitants, I desire to make through you the following proposition to the Town of Lexington:

If the inhabitants of the Town of Lexington, in a town meeting duly called for that purpose, will vote to establish a free public library open under suitable regulations to all the inhabitants of the town, and will appropriate or otherwise procure the sum of $1,000 in books suitable for a town library or in cash for the purchase of books, and will vote that they will after the opening of said library for use appropriate the sum of $40 a year for the purchase or repair of books for said library for the space of six years, I will give them $1,000 the interest of which shall be expended from year to year for the purchase of books to increase the said library.

The said sum of $1,000 thus given shall be held by the selectmen and the school committee of the town for the time being and the settled ministers of the place as trustees who shall invest the same and expend the interest accruing therefrom in their best discretion for such books as they shall deem suitable for the library, and the said trustees shall have the general supervision of said library and shall make such rules and regulations for the management thereof as they may consider most conducive to the public interest, the said rules and regulations to be submitted to the town for their approval. And the said trustees shall report to the town annually stating the manner in which the fund held by them is invested, the number of volumes in the library, and the general condition of the same, with such suggestions and recommendations as they may deem useful to the parties concerned.

This offer is made upon the conditions, that if said library shall be abandoned, or shall at any time cease to be kept open to the inhabitants of the town, as above provided, the said town shall forfeit and the trustees shall make over said sum of $1,000 (to be given by me) together with the accrued interest which shall remain by them unexpended to me and my heirs, executors and administrators.

Maria Cary.

At a meeting held on April 20, 1868, the Town of Lexington voted to establish a public library, to be called the Cary Library, and to accept the offer of Maria Cary and to comply with all the conditions annexed to the gift.

The Library was duly established and other funds were subsequently donated towards the library fund.

The petitioner was incorporated under chap. 242 of the Acts of 1888 for the purpose of taking possession of the funds, books and other property then in the hands of the trustees of the Cary Library. Upon the refusal by the trustees to deliver the same this action was brought.

The other facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Robinson & Blaney, for petitioner:

Petitioner has a legal right to the property of which possession is sought to be obtained, because all of it was at the time of the passage of the Act of Incorporation vested in the inhabitants of the Town of Lexington as absolute owners, or in trust for sundry public purposes. By vote of the inhabitants the title of the town was transferred to the petitioner.

This being so, the Statute is unconstitutional.

Cascade R. Co. v. Baily, 3 Or. 164; Alexandria & F. R. Co. v. Alexandria & W. R. Co. 75 Va. 730.

The exceptions to this rule are cases where the property of a railroad company, not in use for railroad purposes and not necessary to the proper exercise of its franchise, was authorized to be taken by another company. Peoria P. & J. R. Co. v. Peoria & S. R. Co. 66 Ill. 174; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Pittsburg, W. & K. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 812.

But the authorization must be by express words (Eastern R. Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co. 111 Mass. 125; Lewis v. Germantown, N. & P. R. Co. 16 Phila. 621); or must arise by necessary implication. Providence & W. R. Co. v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 138 Mass. 277. See note to *Barre R. Co. v. Montpelier & White Riv. R. An implication arises that the Legislature intended that such appropriation may be made, when it appears that the contemplated road could not reasonably be built without such appropriation. Fall River Iron Works v. Old Colony & F. R. R. Co. 5 Allen, 221; Springfield v. Connecticut River R. Co. 4 Cush. 63.

Another exception to the general rule is that when necessary for the right of way of one railroad company a small and immaterial portion of the appurtenances of another company may be 7 L. R. A.

taken. New York, H. & N. R. Co. v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. 36 Conn. 196; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 112 Ill. 589; Northern R. Co. v. Concord & C. R. Co. 27 N. Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The foundation of the Cary Library in Lexington was a gift of $1,000, made by Maria Cary in accordance with the terms of her letter of December 10, 1867. Upon compliance by the town with the condition named in the letter, her gift was to go to the inhabitants of the town to be held by a board of trustees consisting of the selectmen and school committee of the town for the time being and the settled ministers of the place, who were to invest it, and expend the accruing interest in their best discretion for such books as they should deem suitable for the Library, and were to have the general supervision of the Library and to make such rules and regulations for the management of it as they should consider most conducive to the public interest, such rules and regulations to be submitted to the town for approval. Her scheme contemplated the establishment of a public library for the benefit of all the inhabitants of Lexington, supported in part by the income of a fund furnished by her, and in part by moneys supplied by the town. It is perhaps not of much consequence in the consideration of this case, or in the practical management of the trust, whether the legal title to the fund, or to the Library itself, was in the trustees or in the town. In either case the trustees had the management and control of the fund and of the Library. They had not a mere naked power, but a power coupled with a trust. Drury v. Natick, 10 Allen, 169.

We are of the opinion that they had the legal title to the fund contributed by Mrs. Cary, and that the interest of the inhabitants was merely beneficiary. The considerations which induced the court to make a similar decision as to the legacy referred to in Atty-Gen. v. Parker, 126 Mass. 216, apply equally to this case. There the legacy was to the town "for the benefit of all the youth of the town." It was said in the opinion that the powers given to the trustees were inconsistent with the idea that the town was to be the owner of the legal title to the money. It is true in this case also that the rights and duties of the trustees in the management and disposition of the fund show that they have the legal title. The principal reason for holding in Drury v. Natick, supra, that the town took the fee in the property devised, is wanting in the case at bar. See also Hadley v. Hopkins Academy, 14 Pick. 262.

It seems to have been intended that the legal title to the library itself should be in the town. The letter required the town, as a condition precedent to receiving the gift, to "vote to establish a free public library," and to provide a sum of money towards the establishment and support of it. It was nowhere said that the title to the money supplied by the town, or to the books procured with it, should pass to the trustees, but it was rather implied that the library should be the property of the inhabitants, although under a trust that it should be supervised and managed by the trustees.

By another communication, on April 6, 1870, Mrs. Cary made another gift of $6,000, on precisely the same terms as the first, except that the trustees were directed to expend $1,000 of it in appropriately fitting up and furnishing the library rooms. On her death $5,000 more passed by her will to the Cary Library without a particular designation of the trust. It may be doubtful, and it is immaterial, whether that sum went to the trustees as holders of the legal estate, or to the town. At all events it was to be held solely for the support and maintenance of the Library, and the proceeds of it were to be used and expended under the supervision of the same trustees.

That part of the donor's scheme which relates to the management and control of the fund and of the Library cannot be disregarded as unimportant. It prescribed the method of administering the charity which she thought best adapted to the accomplishment of her purpose. She chose to give her money to be used in that way. She did not authorize the use of it in any other way, unless for some reason it should become impracticable to pursue the course which she prescribed. It is fair to presume that before founding this charity, she carefully considered the subject of its administration, and thought it wise to select for her board of trustees those public officers who have in their special charge the business interests of the town, and those whose duty it is to superintend the education of children, together with such reverend gentlemen as regularly minister in the churches, and are expected earnestly to desire the moral and religious welfare of all the people. This part of Mrs. Cary's proposal was carefully regarded by the town in all its proceedings, and was treated as an important element in the agreement which resulted from the acceptance of her offer.

The Statute of 1868, chap. 842, by which the plaintiff was incorporated and under which it claims title, purports to authorize the town to vote to transfer to the plaintiff all the funds and property held by the town for the purposes of a public library, or for the Cary Library then existing, and also the books, pamphlets and other property constituting the Cary Library, and to vote to assent to a taking by the plaintiff of all the funds and property held by the trustees of the Cary Library under the terms of the gifts and bequests of Maria Cary. The town voted to make the transfer and to assent to the taking, and the plaintiff filed a statement of a taking in accordance with the provisions of the Statute. The principal question now before us is whether by these proceedings the plaintiff acquired a valid title.

The Statute to which we have referred undertakes to materially change the execution of the trust. It allows the town by a single act to divest itself of all property in the Library, and of all connection with it, and of all right to have reports as to its condition or the investment of its funds. A transfer and taking under the Statute place the Library and the funds given by Maria Cary, and acquired from other sources, in the hands of a corporation, which, besides the school committee and the selectmen of the town for the time being, is to consist of not less than thirty nor more than fifty members, of whom nine are named in the Act and the others are to be chosen by these. It vests the management and control of the property, subject to the by-laws of the corporation, in a board of nine trustees to be elected by the corporation from its members. The settled ministers of the town are not made incorporators. While the selectmen and school committee are ex officio members of the corporation, they cannot be upon the board of trustees unless they chance to be elected to that place by their associates. No one of the board of trustees created by the acceptance of Mrs. Cary's gift is left upon the managing board under this Statute.

Without the consent of the donor such a change in the execution of a charitable trust has never been authorized by the courts in England, when it was practicable to execute the trust according to the original intention.

In Atty-Gen. v. Boulton, 2 Ves. Jr. 380, 237, it is said by the Master of the Rolls that "the court will not decree execution of a trust in a manner different from that intended, except so far as they see that the intention cannot be executed literally." It is only when it becomes impracticable to administer a charitable trust according to its terms that a court of chancery will apply the doctrine of cyprès. Atty-Gen. v. Hurlley, 2 Jac. & W. 382; Atty-Gen. v. Earl of Mansfield, 2 Russ. 520; Atty-Gen. v. Whitechurch, 8 Ves. Jr. 141; Atty-Gen. v. Whiteley, 11 Ves. Jr. 241; Atty-Gen. v. Dedham F. G. School, 23 Beav. 850, 857.

This subject has repeatedly been considered by this court.

In Winthrop v. Atty-Gen., 128 Mass. 258, the trustees under a deed of trust, who held a large sum to be used in founding and maintaining a museum of American Archeology and Ethnology in connection with Harvard University, sought to make an agreement whereby the fund would be placed under the control and management of the president and fellows of Harvard College to be held as a part of their general funds, and a part of the income bearing the proportion to the whole which this part of the fund bore to the whole fund to be paid over to the trustees. The court said that such a departure from the directions of the donor could be justified, if at all, only upon proof of the most pressing exigency; and that the court cannot alter the scheme of a donor, "either as to the objects of the charity or the agents by which it is to be administered, unless it appears to be impossible to carry out the scheme according to its terms."

A similar decision was made in Harvard College v. Society for Promoting Theological Education, 8 Gray, 280.

In Fellows v. Miner, 119 Mass. 541, a bequest was made by a testator residing in this State to the Town of Kinderhook in New York, in trust for the charitable uses declared in the will. Under the laws of the State of New York, a town could not take such a charitable bequest without express authority from the Legislature, and, an Act having been passed giving the town authority to receive the bequest, it was held that the money could not be paid over because the Act authorized the appointment of the persons who were to collect and distribute the income of the fund to be made by the supervisors and justices of the peace of the town, while the will directed that they should be appointed by the town itself. See also Baker v. Smith, 18 Met. 34, 41; Smith Charities v. Northampton, 10 Allen, 498, 501, 502; Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 539, 591, 592; Morville v. Fowle, 144 Mass. 109, 4 New Eng. Rep. 89.

It is quite clear that, upon grounds of mere expediency, and in the absence of an emergency requiring it, the court could not decree such a change in the administration of the trust as is contemplated by this Statute; and it becomes necessary to inquire whether the principles of law which limit the authority of the court in a case of this kind are equally applicable to the action of the Legislature under our Constitution.

The acceptance by the town of Maria Cary's proposition contained in her letter created a contract, which was executed on her part by the payment of the money, and which continued binding on the town and the trustees as to their conduct in reference to the charity.

Prior to the decision in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 518 [4 L. ed. 629], it was uncertain what construction would be given by the Supreme Court of the United States to the word "contracts" in section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no State shall pass any "law impairing the obligation of contracts." It was settled by that case that the word is to be interpreted broadly and liberally, so as to include all obligations which should be enforced and held sacred growing out of agreements, express or implied, for which there is a valuable consideration.

There can be no doubt that the money of Maria Cary was paid under a contract, within the meaning of that word in this clause of the Constitution. The principles by which the courts of England and of this country have been controlled, in the decisions to which we have referred, are those rules of common right which protect men in their transactions with one another.

Among them is that fundamental one which is embodied in this provision of the Constitution. If it applies to a change in the administration of a charitable trust, such as has been attempted in the present case, it controls the action of the Legislature as effectually as that of the courts.

We think it does apply. The town impliedly agreed with Maria Cary to conform to the terms of her letter. The trustees also agreed that, so long as they continued to be members of the board, they would execute their trust according to her stipulations. She indicated a general purpose to devote her money to this charity, even if it should become impossible to administer it in the manner proposed, and she impliedly agreed that the court might make any reasonable modification of her scheme which might at any time become necessary. The town might become a city, and the board of selectmen or the school committee might be abolished by law, or many other things might occur which would render it impossible or impracticable literally to follow her directions. She impliedly agreed that in such a case the court or the Legislature might modify her method to adapt it to changed conditions. But she did not agree that any material change might be made unless there should be an exigency for it.

It does not appear to be necessary to depart from the plan of administration adopted by the original donor. There seems to be no practical difficulty in conforming literally to the scheme at first proposed. Under these circumstances none of the parties can be relieved from the obligations of their contract without the consent of all the others. The Statute makes no provision for obtaining the consent of any party except the town.

Besides Maria Cary, many others have made gifts for the Library, of which some were given in terms to the trustees of the Cary Library, some to Cary Library and some to the town. It is to be presumed that these persons knew on what trusts the Library was established and was to be managed, and that they made their gifts to be held under the same trusts. In connection with each of the gifts, the donor, the town and the trustees impliedly became parties to the same contract in regard to the management of the Library as that made with Mrs. Cary. Hadley v. Hopkins Academy, 14 Pick. 262; Edwards v. Jagers, 19 Ind. 407, 415.

So far as appears, George W. Robinson is the only donor who has consented to a change after contract. If it be assumed that Alice B. Cary, the residuary legatee of Maria Cary, has assented by petitioning for the passage of the Statute and becoming one of the corporators and a trustee, her assent is not equivalent to the assent of the original donor. Two of the gifts of Maria Cary were made in her lifetime, and the contract was fully executed on her part. Her residuary legatee does not legally represent her desire to secure a permanent benefit to the inhabitants of Lexington. Her representative succeeds only to her rights of property. Her right to have the trust executed in the interest of charity is a personal right, whose value was in her enjoyment of doing good, and it is not allied to the interest which an heir might have to avail himself of property which belonged to his ancestor. Sanderson 7 L. R. A.

v. White, 18 Pick. 328, 333; American Academy of Arts and Sciences v. Harvard College, 12 Gray, 542; Atty-Gen. v. Margaret and Regius Professors, 1 Vern. 55.

The possibility of a reversion under the last clause of the letter gives the residuary legatee no right to consent to a modification of the scheme. So far as there is a succession to a mere right of property in the contract, her executor and residuary legatee might represent her; although such a representation could not include a right to consent to the change proposed. But it is not necessary to decide that Alice B. Cary cannot give consent for Maria Cary. It is enough that there is no one who assumes to represent the other donors, and that their consent is not obtained.

If, in a case of this kind, either the original donor or those who subsequently contributed to the charity might be sufficiently represented by the trustees, the Statute in the present case makes no provision for obtaining the trustees' consent, and the paper signed by a majority of them separately, and without conference with their associates, is so inconsistent with the performance of the ordinary duties of their trust that it cannot be taken as representing a valid act of the board. Morville v. Knole, 144 Mass. 100, 4 New Eng. Rep. 89.

We are of opinion that the Statute which we are considering impairs the obligation of the contract under which this charity is administered. The principles which lie at the foundation of the Dartmouth College Case and of other similar decisions are decisive of the question before us. Louisville v. University of Louisville, 15 B. Mon. 642; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 518 [4 L. ed. 629]; Allen v. McKean, 1 Sumn. 277; New Worcester School Fund v. Bradbury, 11 Me. 118; University of Maryland v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 265, 406; Norris v. Abington Academy, 7 Gill & J. 7; Brown v. Hummel, 6 Pa. 86, 96.

The law laid down in these cases, that a charter establishing an eleemosynary corporation is a contract which cannot be changed by the Legislature without the consent of the parties to it, is a mere extension of the doctrine which gives a similar effect to the written statement of the scheme that is made the foundation of donations to unincorporated trustees of a public charity.

As if apprehensive that the Statute, in the parts already considered, was in conflict with the Constitution, the framers of the Act embodied in it a provision for taking the property under the right of eminent domain. Of this property $1,500 was money deposited in a savings bank; and there were two promissory notes of the Town of Lexington, amounting to $11,000, bearing interest, and payable to the treasurer of the board of trustees.

Property can be taken in this way only in the exercise of the paramount right of the government founded on a public necessity. The question has been somewhat considered whether that necessity can ever extend to the taking of money.

In Burnett v. Sacramento, 12 Cal. 76, Mr. Justice Field, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, says: "Money is not that species of property which the sovereign authority can authorize to be taken in the exercise of its right of eminent domain. That right can be exercised only with reference to other property than money; for the property taken is to be the subject of compensation in money itself, and the general doctrine of the authorities of the present day is that payment must be either made, or a fund provided for it in advance."

In Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 4th ed. 656, a similar opinion is expressed, and language to the same effect is found in People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 419, 424.

There may be a great public exigency, as in time of war, which will authorize the governments to take money in the exercise of this right. Mitchell v. Harmony, 54 U. S. 18 How. 128 [14 L. ed. 81]; Wellman v. Wickerman, 44 Mo. 454; Yost v. Stout, 4 Coldw. 205.

But it cannot truly be said that the taking of money by a private corporation created to administer a public charity is a taking of property for public use. The money taken must be paid for in money. It cannot be taken unless it is paid for in advance or sufficient provision is made for immediate payment, which provision must be in money or in that which is deemed its equivalent. There can be no necessity for such a taking. In its nature it is not a taking for a public use. There can be a taking for a public use under this power only when in the nature of the case there is or may be a public necessity for the taking. There cannot be such a necessity in favor of a private corporation which must provide money to pay for money. For this reason we are of opinion that the Legislature could not authorize the taking of this property by the petitioner.

The only statement of the use to which the property is to be put is found in the provision that it is "to be held and applied in the same manner as if held by said trustees." The question arises whether taking property from one party who holds it for a public use by another to hold it in the same manner for precisely the same public use can be authorized under the Constitution. Can such a taking be founded on a public necessity? It is unlike taking property for a public use which is already devoted to a different public use. There may be a necessity for that. In the first case the property is already appropriated to a public use as completely in every particular as it is to be. Can the taking be found to be for the purpose which must exist to give it validity? In every case it is a judicial question whether the taking is of such a nature that it is or may be founded on a public necessity. If it is of that nature, it is for the Legislature to say whether in a particular case the necessity exists. We are of opinion that the proceeding authorized by the Statute was, in its nature, merely a transfer of property from one party to another, and not an appropriation of property to public use nor a taking which was, or which could be found by the Legislature, to be a matter of public necessity. West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U. S. 6 How. 507 [12 L. ed. 535]; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co. 97 Ill. 506; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 112 Ill. 529.

For these reasons the majority of the court are of opinion that the Statute of 1888, chap. 842, is not in conformity with the Constitution of the United States. It follows that the petitioner has no title to the property in the hands of the trustees of the Cary Library, and that the petition must be dismissed.

Silas H. POMEROY et al.

(.....Mass.....)

1. Where trustees are authorized to carry on a business and contract debts therein, and are given a right of indemnity from the trust estate for the personal liability incurred thereby, when the time arrives for terminating the trust a creditor of such trustees may bring suit in equity on behalf of himself and of other similar creditors to reach the trust fund for the satisfaction of his debt without first recovering a judgment at law.
2. A bill filed for such purpose will not be subject to demurrer for failure to contain an offer to make good to the trust estate the losses incurred by defaults for which the estate would have a claim on the trustee, even on the theory that the creditor can only reach the equity of the trustee to indemnity, since the creditor would succeed only to such rights as the trustee might be found to have.
3. If a trust to carry on a business with power to contract debts is given to three trustees who carry on the business for a time and in so doing contract debts, and then two of the trustees retire from the trust and the other trustee continues the business and contracts more debts in good faith and for the benefit of the business, upon the termination of the trust and the winding up of the business the creditors whose claims accrued during the management of the three trustees have no equity to priority in payment over the other creditors in the absence of provisions to that effect in the statutes or in the instrument constituting the trust.
4. Where a decree of court directs the taking of an account of the amount due to certain creditors of a business conducted by a trustee and the giving of a mortgage upon the business to secure the same, the right to the mortgage will be lost if no steps are taken to secure it until long afterward, when proceedings have been begun for the winding up of the trust and bills have been filed by other creditors to reach the trust property.

(February 27, 1890.)

ON reservation from the Supreme Judicial Court for Berkshire County (C. Allen, J.) upon bill, answer, demurrer, replication and master's report, of a suit by a creditor to obtain from a trust estate payment for goods furnished to the trustee for the benefit of the estate. Decree for complainants.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. M. Wilcox, for plaintiffs:

These trustees stand (at the termination of the trust), in relation to the trust estate (still in their hands) in no better condition than sureties holding securities from a principal debtor for payment or for indemnity against payment of debts due from the principal debtor to the creditor. And such a relation gives a direct equitable right to the creditor to look to the trust property for payment.

Stacy v. McMillan, 6 Colo. W. 334; Caproni v. Bylora, 8 Meak. 523; Reidert v. Thos., 8 Kan. 63, 65; Vail v. Foster, 4 N. Y. 812, and the authorities cited; 1 Story, Eq. § 684, 689; Eastman v. Foster, 8 Met. 19; New Bedford Sav. Inst. v. Fishback Bank, 9 Allen, 175, and cases cited; Moses v. Murgatroyd, 1 Johns. Ch. 119; Phillips v. Thompson, 2 Johns. Ch. 418; Ten Eyck v. Holmes, 8 Handf. Ch. 426; Curtis v. Tyler, 9 Paige, 432.

The court then goes on to say that the right of the creditor does not depend on insolvency of the surety, and the creditor is not bound to wait until the fund goes into the hands of an assignee and assert his right there.

The equity of the creditor does not depend upon the fact whether or not the trustee be in advance or in default to the trust estate.

Willy v. Collins, 9 Ga. 235; Helm v. Young, 9 B. Mon. 894.

The equitable right of the creditor is not derivative from the surety or trustee holding the trust property, but is an independent right superior to the control of the trustee, and equity will cause the trust to be executed.

See Inter v. Ecclegh, 4 Deaus. Eq. 19, 6 Am. Dec. 501; James v. Mayrant, 4 Deaus. Eq. 591, 6 Am. Dec. 530; Montgomery v. Ecclegh, 1 McCord, Ch. 267; 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. (3d Am. ed.) 590; Story, Eq. § 1250.

These creditors dealt with persons intrusted with the control and management of the trust business, and furnished things necessary therefor in good faith, relying on the trust estate as well as on the personal liability of the person or persons conducting the business. They have a right to look to the trust property embarked in the trade.

Messrs. F. P. Goulding and T. P. Plagres, for defendants Turnbull and Atwater, trustees:

The bill simply shows a contract debt of personally sold to one of the three trustees, and if the plaintiff has any claim, an action at law will be the simple, plain, adequate remedy for the recovery of his debt.

Jones v. Nicholl, 115 Mass. 244.

And in this Commonwealth a bill is demurrable, not only if it shows that the plaintiff has a remedy at law equally sufficient and available, but if also it fails to show that he is without such remedy.

Jones v. Nicholl, 115 Mass. 252, 253, and cases cited.

The plaintiff cannot maintain a creditor's bill because he does not show that he has recovered judgment on his debt.

The bill cannot be maintained because of a lack of proper parties plaintiff. The plaintiff and other claims are separate and distinct in diverse parties, having no connection with each other, and no one plaintiff interested in the claim of the other, and arise by diverse distinct contracts for personally with each claimant, without any privity between them, and where knowledge and notice to one would not bind another.

The bill is not that of one or more creditors suing in behalf of all, for the enforcement of a trust inter vivos, where any decree is for the benefit of all. There is no trust here to be enforced. The trustees conducting the trust are individually liable at law for the debts each has contracted, and he is responsible only for his own act, unless he has aided or concurred in the wrong-doing or mal appropriation of assets by his associate trustee; and no such act or doings are alleged in this bill.

For the fraudulent acts of Pomeroy in conducting the business intrusted to him under the decree by which he created these debts of the second class, the defendants Turnbull and Atwater are not answerable.

Barnard v. Bagshaw, 3 De G. J. & S. 355, 358.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The late Theodore Pomeroy devised his mills and manufacturing property to three trustees, in trust, to continue and carry on his manufacturing business until his son Theodore L. Pomeroy should arrive at the age of twenty-one years. They were to provide for the outstanding and current liabilities and to incur, on account of said trust estate, during the continuance of the trust, such further liabilities as a wise and prudent management might require, and, when his said son should become twenty-one years of age, to convey the property to testator's two sons Silas H. and Theodore L., or in case either one of them should decline to continue in business with the other, then to convey the same to the other, upon his paying certain sums to the son who should withdraw, with certain other provisions relating to the termination of the trust, not necessary to be recited here. The will further provides that the trustees should be entitled to fair and reasonable compensation, and that they should not be liable for any loss to the trust estate which did not involve bad faith on their part, and that at the termination of the trust and before any transfer or conveyance they should be fully indemnified against any then existing personal liability incurred in the proper execution of the trust.

The three trustees accepted the trust and carried on the business together until May, 1885, when, in consequence of disagreements which had arisen among them, it was arranged that thenceforth the business should be carried on by Silas H. Pomeroy, one of the trustees, and this was done, under the circumstances which are detailed in the master's report. The son Theodore L. became twenty-one years of age on November 18, 1887, and the time had thus come for the termination of the trust. A large amount of indebtedness was then existing, some of which was incurred by the three trustees while carrying on the business together, and some by Silas H. Pomeroy while carrying on the business alone. A partnership firm belonging to the latter class of creditors brought the present suit in behalf of themselves and of other similar creditors, averring that the trustees refused to pay their said debts, and that neither of them had property open to attachment or execution, and seeking to establish and enforce an equitable right to have their claims paid out of the trust property, and especially to have enforced in their favor the right of the trustees for reimbursement and indemnity out of the trust fund, before its distribution.

The principal questions in the case are raised by the two trustees who withdrew from the active management of the business in 1885, and they contend that the creditors whose debts accrued under the joint management are entitled to a priority over the later creditors, and indeed that the present bill cannot be maintained at all by the latter. In support of their demurrer, they rely upon the following propositions: (1) that the plaintiffs have no equity because they do not offer in the bill to make good to the trust fund the losses and defaults occasioned by the acts of the trustee, Silas H. Pomeroy, with whom they contracted, and that their right to the trust fund must be limited by his right to indemnify from that fund; (2) that the plaintiffs' sole remedy is at law; (3) that there has been no previous recovery of judgment by the plaintiffs; and (4) that there is no community of interest between the plaintiffs, and that one creditor cannot sue in behalf of all.

The most of these objections are answered by a brief consideration of the nature of the bill. It is in its essential character a bill seeking to enforce the proper execution of a trust, which is ready to be terminated, and in which nothing remains to be done but to transfer the trust property in accordance with the equitable rights of the various parties who assert conflicting claims thereto. It is indeed difficult to see how this object can be accomplished in any other way than by a suit in equity. The plaintiffs claim equitable rights in the premises. Their position as creditors entitles them to assert such rights and to seek the determination of the court whether on the particular facts of the case their rights should be sustained, that is to say, where trustees are authorized to carry on a business and contract debts, they are not only liable personally for the payment of them, but the creditors may also resort to case. Ex parte Garland, 10 Ves. Jr. 110; Ex parte Richardson, 8 Madd. 138; Owen v. Delamere, L. R. 15 Eq. 184; Cutbush v. Cutbush, 1 Beav. 184; Thompson v. Andrews, 1 Myl. & K. 116; Burnell v. Mandeville, 48 U. S. 3 How. 800 [11 L. ed. 878]; Smith v. Ayer, 101 U. S. 830, 830 [25 L. ed. 935]; Jones v. Walker, 103 U. S. 444 [26 L. ed. 404]; Pittin v. Pittin, 7 Conn. 801, 3 Story, Eq. § 1400; Lewis, Tr. 7th ed. 217.

It is indeed contended on the part of the plaintiffs that their right to resort to the trust property is a primary and original right, which exists independently of any right on the part of the trustees to be indemnified. Wyllie v. Collins, 9 Ga. 229.

The view, however, which has prevailed in England, so far as the question has been discussed, is that the creditors may reach the trust property when the trustees are entitled to be indemnified therefrom, and that the creditors reach it by being substituted for the trustees and standing in their place. Re Johnson, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 548; Dowse v. Gorton, L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 528; Ludley, Part. 4th ed. 607, 608.

It is with reference to this doctrine that the defendants contend that the plaintiffs ought to offer in their bill to make good to the trust fund the losses and defaults occasioned by the acts of Silas H. Pomeroy. But this ground is untenable on the demurrer, because, assuming for the present this doctrine to be correct and taking the plaintiffs' case upon the lowest ground, the bill sets out the right of the trustees to be indemnified against personal liability incurred in the proper execution of the trust, the existence of such liability to the plaintiffs and others and the equitable right of the plaintiffs and others to have enforced in their favor for the payment of their claims the rights of the trustees for reimbursement and indemnity; and it asserts a right to have their claims paid out of the trust property and estate in full, or if such property and estate are insufficient, then to have their claims paid in pro rata proportions, and prays that the trustees be held and ordered to account for the trust property, and that an account of the creditors may also be taken and the equitable interest of Silas H. Pomeroy in the trust estate may be sold and disposed of, and the proceeds applied to payment of the plaintiffs and others. There is no occasion for any distinct offer on the part of the plaintiffs to make good any possible losses to the trust estate, arising from his misconduct, if any such there were, since they would only succeed to such rights as he might be found to have. There is no suggestion in the bill of any misconduct or default on his part, but if there were, and if the plaintiffs have no higher right than simply to stand in his place, the bill need not contain any such offer to make good losses in order to entitle the plaintiffs to reach whatever upon account may be found to remain as a fund from which he would be entitled to be indemnified. The result of such an accounting cannot be anticipated on a demurrer. If it should prove finally that there was nothing to which he was entitled, then the plaintiffs would fail on the merits, unless they

to the equity of the trustee who contracted the debt to them.

It is not necessary that the plaintiffs who institute such a suit should first have recovered judgment on their claim, or even that their claim should be yet due. Whitmore v. Osterrow, 2 Young & C. Ch. 18; Story, Eq. 85, 47.

And the usual way is for one creditor to sue in behalf of all. Story, Eq. Pl. § 99; B-ber v. Wood, 3 Paige, 520; Fullitt v. Hall et al., 2 Paige, 15; Chapman v. Harkers & T. Pub. (N. 12) Mass. 478; Thompson v. Dunn, L. R. 6 Ch. 572.

We can have no doubt, therefore, that the demurrer to the bill should be overruled. The demurrer was contained in the answer, and there appears to have been no formal order by a single justice overruling it, but the case was referred to a master, who has made a report which was apparently designed to present all the material facts involved in the issues raised by the pleadings. No objections or exceptions were taken to the report, and when the case came on to be heard before a single justice, it was, upon the request of both parties, reserved for the determination of the full court, upon the pleadings and the master's report. The more important questions which have been argued upon the merits are two: (1) whether the rights of the plaintiffs are qualified by any equity which exists in favor of the trust estate against Silas H. Pomeroy; (2) whether the earlier creditors are entitled to have a priority over the later ones.

In reference to the first of these questions, there is nothing in the facts stated in the master's report which shows that there is any equity existing in favor of the trust estate against Silas H. Pomeroy, so that we have no occasion to consider the question whether, as a general rule of equity, the rights of the plaintiffs would be qualified thereby in case it should be found that he was himself subject to any such equity.

Mention has already been made of the provision in the will, that the trustees shall be entitled to a fair and reasonable compensation for their services in administering the trust, and shall not be liable to any loss to the trust estate which does not involve bad faith on their part. Assuming that the doctrine of the recent English cases above cited [Re Johnson and Dowse v. Gorton] is applicable to the present case, we find nothing to show that Silas H. Pomeroy is indebted to the trust estate, or that he has caused any loss to the same for which he is responsible, under the terms of the will. There has been no formal accounting, and the material facts, briefly stated, upon which this question depends are as follows: Until May, 1885, the trustees carried on the business together. While so carrying it on, disagreements arose, and the other two trustees brought a bill in equity in the court, on the 11th of April, 1885, against Silas H. Pomeroy and the other parties in interest, under the statute giving jurisdiction in equity to regulate the execution of trusts.

On the 18th of May, 1885, an agreement was made whereby Silas H. Pomeroy was to take charge of the mills and property and carry on the business, and pay over to Turnbull, who was one of the other trustees, and whom firm was also a large creditor of the trustees, the net avails over and above the cost of manufacture of the goods manufactured and sold by him, and he was also to give to the two other trustees an agreement with acceptable surety indemnifying them against any liability, debt or obligation created by his acts, and also securing the payment above provided for to Turnbull. No restriction was put upon his power to contract debts in carrying on the business. Such agreement with surety was given, and Pomeroy took possession of the mills and property and proceeded with the manufacturing business under the same name as before.

On the 1st of June, 1886, a decree was made in the suit in equity denying a motion for a receiver, and prescribing the manner in which Pomeroy should thereafter conduct the business. He was to proceed with the manufacture of the wool and raw material then on hand and turn over the net avails of the goods to Turnbull & Co.; his right to purchase new material was limited; after all the stock should be manufactured he was to be at liberty to continue the business as trustee under the will; as soon as he had manufactured the material on hand and the goods had been sold and the proceeds applied as above provided, then the balance, if any, due to Turnbull & Co., was to be determined by reference to a master, if the parties did not agree, and a mortgage upon the trust property was to be given to secure such balance, and thereupon the two other trustees were to be discharged as trustees; the business was to be so conducted as to create no liability upon the two other trustees; and there were certain other subordinate provisions. Pomeroy failed in certain particulars to conform to the above decree, and on the 4th of June, 1887, a new decree was entered, reciting that he had disobeyed the order of the court in that he had failed to turn over to Turnbull & Co. the net proceeds of the goods, and had intermingled the material and goods, until their identity had been lost, and had used the proceeds for carrying on the general business of manufacturing, and that he had thus failed to apply $40,000; and it was thereupon ordered that all the wool and raw material then on hand should be devoted and set apart to raise $40,000 to be applied as directed in the former decree.

The decree further provided that the business of manufacturing should be continued, and that additional necessary material might be purchased from time to time not exceeding $100,000, and added to and mixed with the stock on hand. From the proceeds of such manufacture after deducting the cost of such additional property, and expense, the sum of $40,000 and interest was to be paid to Turnbull & Co., or to creditors of the three trustees. There were other provisions not necessary to be stated here. The master finds that it was admitted that the provisions above mentioned have been substantially fulfilled. The new decree in the particulars above mentioned was a substitute for the former decree. If while the first decree was in force he exceeded what was therein prescribed in respect to the purchase of goods, that transgression was cured by the appropriation of the property so purchased under the new decree. The goods so purchased went into the trust property and thus went for the benefit of the other trustees in raising the $40,000. The master expressly finds that the goods became a part of the trust property, and that they were suitable and necessary therefor. Whether the purchase was or was not in accordance with the first decree, the second decree dealt with the question of any failure in that respect, and it has been complied with; so that it is not now to be alleged against Pomeroy that he failed to comply with the terms of the first decree, in respect to the purchase of goods.

There were certain other particulars in the decree of June 1, 1886, respecting which nothing has yet been done, namely, the indebtedness of the trust estate to Turnbull & Co. has not been determined, and no mortgage to secure the same has been given. With reference to these the first step to be taken was to determine the amount of indebtedness by reference to a master, if the parties did not agree, and if this has not been done there is nothing to show that the omission has been through any fault of Pomeroy. It was a matter between the three trustees on the one side, and Turnbull & Co. on the other, Mr. Turnbull himself being on both sides.

There has been no accounting, in which Pomeroy has been found to be in default, as in the case of Re Johnson, before cited; and there is nowhere in the master's report any finding that there has been any loss to the trust estate through any fault of his; much less, that there has been any loss which involved bad faith on his part. We are therefore unable to see that he is in any manner indebted to the trust estate, or that there is any equity existing against him to prevent him from being indemnified out of the trust estate for personal liabilities assumed by him in the conduct of the business.

Nor do we see any good reason for giving to the first class of creditors, whose debts accrued while the three trustees were carrying on the business, a priority over the latter creditors whose debts accrued during the management of Pomeroy. The business during the whole time was the business contemplated in the will. There was no change of trustees. By an arrangement among themselves, which was sanctioned by the court, one of the trustees assumed the direct management of the business, but there was no separation of the property, no inventory, no accounting and no withdrawal or discharge of any of the trustees. The trustees who retired from the active management made an arrangement with their associate which was then deemed sufficient for their protection. Pomeroy's failure in the first instance to conform to the directions of the first decree of the court was made good by what he did under the second decree. The master finds that he incurred debts and liabilities for and on account of the business for goods and materials used in and made a part and parcel of the trust property, and such goods and materials were suitable and necessary for the manufacturing business as conducted by him, and for payment of them the creditors relied on the credit of the trust property, as well as on his personal credit; and these are the debts due to the plaintiffs and those in whose behalf this suit is prosecuted. The trust is now ready to be closed. It is found that there are two classes of creditors exist; the first class to the amount of about $91,000, and the second class to the amount of about $51,000, besides a few others which are to be dealt with specially. They have all furnished materials and supplies to the trust property, and it may prove that the trust property now remaining is insufficient to pay them all in full. Why should one class of creditors be preferred to another? There is nothing in the statutes and nothing in the provisions of the will directly applicable to such a case. It is suggested that under the decree made in June, 1886, it was contemplated that a mortgage upon the trust property should be given which would inure to the benefit of the first class of creditors. But such mortgage was to be given while the concern was a going concern; it has never been given, and the time has never come for it to be given. There was first to be a determination of the amount due, by a reference to a master, and this has never been done. The business is now no longer to be carried on under the trust but the trust is to be wound up, and in view of the question in controversy it is to be treated as if the trust property were insufficient to pay the debts in full. Ordinarily, under the insolvent laws, an agreement by a debtor to give to his creditor a mortgage in the future will not protect the mortgage when given from being set aside as a preference. Copeland v. Barnes, 147 Mass. 288, 890, 7 New Eng. Rep. 61, and cases there cited.

The steps were not seasonably taken to procure the mortgage, and it is now too late. New equities have arisen. If the mortgage had actually been given, creditors would have been bound to take notice of it. Under the decree, it was not certain whether there would be any balance of indebtedness to be secured by the mortgage or whether any mortgage would be given. The decree contemplated a security to be given in the future in case it should be determined that there remained any indebtedness to secure. But now the whole business is stopped and creditors must accept the situation as it is. The later creditors have contributed to increase the trust property and it would not be equitable or just to appropriate the whole trust property to the payment of the earlier creditors in full, leaving the later creditors to the chance of what might remain.

The provision in the decree of June 1, 1886, that the business be so conducted in the future as to create no liability upon the two plaintiffs as trustees, and that they should not be liable for any debt incurred by S. H. Pomeroy in doing the business, referred only to a direct liability on their part. It did not mean that creditors in the future should be postponed to themselves in case of a possible necessity for resorting to the trust property. It is not contended that the creditors whose debts accrued under the management of Pomeroy have any direct claim upon the two other trustees. The several claims specially reported upon by the master may be allowed to be paid out of the trust fund, either as expenses of the administration of the trust, or as the costs of parties properly brought before the court in a suit to determine the duties of the trustees, no objection being made by any party. Under the above decision, there is no need to classify them further. Abbott v. Bradstreet, 3 Allen, 587; 2 Perry, Tr. § 910; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 4th Am. ed. 1412.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

v.
TOWN OF DERBY et al.

(68 Conn. 234.)

1. A town has power to employ counsel to oppose before the General Assembly a petition for the division of its territory.
2. The vote of the town is not necessary to authorize selectmen to employ counsel and incur expense to oppose a division of the town by the General Assembly.

(Andrew, Ch. J., dissents.)

(December 30, 1889.)

RESERVATION from the Superior Court for New Haven County, upon bill, answer and demurrer thereto, of a suit to enjoin the payment by defendants of certain expenses incurred in opposing a petition to the General Assembly for a division of the Town of Derby. Judgment for defendants advised.

The plaintiff with others presented a petition to the General Assembly asking for a division of the Town of Derby and the incorporation of a new town to be called the Town of Ansonia. The town agent and selectmen of Derby retained counsel to oppose this petition and this suit was brought to enjoin the payment for such services from the funds of the Town.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

A town has no such implied right to its existing boundaries that it may defend them against that legislative body which has given the town all the powers it possesses and even its existence itself.

The fact that notice must be given under our statutes that such a petition will be presented to the Legislature, and the fact that notice was served upon the Town of Derby in this case, gives this Town no new rights, duties or powers.

Carpenter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a complaint by certain residents and taxpayers of the Town of Derby, praying for an injunction restraining the defendants from paying the charges of counsel, and other expenses, incurred in defending against the petition for the incorporation of the Town of Ansonia.

The controversy arises mainly under the fifth paragraph of the complaint and the fourth paragraph of the answer. The former is as follows:

"The defendants have already wrongfully and illegally paid money from the treasury of said Town, and threaten and intend to wrongfully and illegally pay additional sums of money from said treasury, to counsel and others to oppose before said General Assembly the proposed division of said Town, as hereinbefore stated, using in so doing money paid into said treasury by the plaintiffs in common with others."

The paragraph of the answer referred to is as follows:

"The said Wheeler, as the agent of said Derby, and the said Wheeler, Genser and Webster, as selectmen of said Derby, acting for and in the name and behalf of said Town of Derby, did retain and employ counsel to attend to several matters and measures brought to and pending before said General Assembly, affecting and concerning the interests of said Town, and to do what could properly and legally be done by them to protect and advance the interests of said Town, as the same should be affected as aforesaid, including within such retainers and employment the opposition by such counsel in the name and behalf of said Town to the granting of said petition and the passage of said resolution; and that they have made a payment from the treasury of such Town on account of such employment, and intend to pay for all legitimate retainers, services and expenses of such counsel rendered or incurred under said employment."

several matters and measures were then being pending before said General Assembly." There are seven other causes of demurrer assigned, which may be summed up and expressed in the language of the plaintiffs' brief,—that the Town has "no power to employ counsel to oppose before the General Assembly the granting of a petition, or the passage of a resolution, dividing its territorial limits."

It will be noticed that the answer expressly admits the precise thing and all that the complaint alleges. The fact that it is included in "several matters and measures" not named, can neither enlarge the scope of the complaint nor destroy the effect of the admission.

But if necessary to specify the other "matters and measures," we think they are sufficiently specified for all the purposes of the answer. The complaint, in terms, only refers to the matter of dividing the Town. While that may fairly include a division of the property, debts, burdens, etc., yet they are not named. The answer brings upon the record the petition and resolution, so that the court can see just what the Legislature was asked to do. In looking at the resolution we find that it embraces several distinct "matters and measures." If they were what the answer referred to, and they probably were, the first cause of demurrer has no foundation in fact.

We come then to the other causes of demurrer, which raise the main question: Has the Town as such the right and power to employ counsel and expend money in proper ways, in opposing the granting of the petition and the passage of the resolution? It will be observed that the question we are considering is not whether the Town has a right to resist the sovereignty of the State in an attempt to change the territorial limits of the Town. Had the State of its own motion, for reasons of public policy, taken steps to change the boundaries of the Town, or abolish it altogether, the case presented would have been a very different one. But the attack was not made by the State from motives of policy and in the interest of good government, but was made by certain parties who sought thereby to promote their own interests. The attack was not directed alone against other individuals who differed from them, but against the Town as well. The end sought involved not only a dismemberment of the Town in respect to territory and population, but also a division of its corporate property, a reduction of its grand list, an apportionment of its debts, liabilities and burdens as to highways, bridges, sewers and the like. In respect to these matters the Town and every taxpayer in the Town had an interest; and they and everyone were duly cited to appear before the Legislature that they might be heard. The proceeding was of an adversary nature, and the opposing parties were brought before the supreme tribunal of the State, that the matter might be adjusted. Here, then, were all the elements of ordinary litigation—a court having competent jurisdiction, parties in interest and matters in controversy. The Town then was not antagonizing the State, but was defending a cause against about cases in which towns have exercised powers which more properly pertain to the functions of the State or the general government, such as McLean v. Kempton, 13 Mass. 272, in which it was held that the town had no power to appropriate money to defend the inhabitants and property of the town against a foreign enemy, the bounty cases in this State, and the like.

Neither is this case to be controlled by those cases in this State and elsewhere which hold that towns have no inherent or reserved powers of legislation, of which many of the cases cited by the plaintiffs are examples.

On the other hand we do not deem it necessary to decide whether towns in this State are essentially different in respect to their origin, powers and duties from towns in other States. We assume that towns have only such powers as are conferred by statute, expressly or by reasonable implication.

Powers and duties carry with them corresponding obligations and rights. Public duties imposed upon towns and the right to have and hold property are inseparable, and the right to hold property begets the power to protect and defend it. These simple and obviously correct propositions will not be controverted. Let us make the application.

Has the Town power to pay its counsel?

That question will be substantially answered by the answer to another—Had the Town a right to appear? In the somewhat exhaustive brief of the plaintiffs we nowhere find the bald proposition in so many words, that the Town had no right to defend. The right of the selectmen to defend without a vote of the Town is denied on the ground, as it is claimed, that the matter does not concern the Town, and therefore that the selectmen, under section 64 of the General Statutes, which provides that they shall superintend the concerns of the Town, had no power to act. Granting the premises, the conclusion follows. Another conclusion, that the Town itself had no power, would seem to be equally logical. But the argument impliedly admits that the Town might act. That admission destroys the premises; for if the Town may act, it is because the Town is interested, if interested, it is one of the concerns of the Town. If the Town fails to take action, it is the duty of the selectmen to take such action as they may deem advisable.

The right of self-defense is well nigh universal. Towns are not exceptions to the rule. They have a right to defend their existence, and to ask for its continuance, even when it is proposed to deprive them of it by law. So long as they exist, and must exist, with certain burdens imposed upon them, certain duties from which they cannot escape, they have a clear right to defend their integrity. When it is proposed to change those burdens, by increasing or lessening them, with a corresponding change in their means and facilities, their right to be heard must be unquestionable.

That a town is interested in questions necessarily arising on the division of the town is hardly a debatable question. What is a town? A corporation. Who are the parties in interest? The corporation, with which they are connected. Their interest pertains, not to their own private affairs, but to the affairs of the corporation. It is not several, but an interest in common. Now the argument is that the organized community may not appear to protect the community interest, but each individual in the community may appear and defend such interest as he may have, infinitesimal though it may be, in common with all the others. We confess our inability to appreciate the force of this logic. If either is to be excluded it would seem more natural to exclude the individual and admit the corporation. It seems to us much more reasonable that the organization, representing the whole, should act for the benefit of all and at the expense of all.

But, as already remarked, the claim is not made in terms that the Town had no right to appear and defend. It did in fact appear, and, so far as we know, without objection. The matter had been pending before the Legislature two months when this suit was brought. During that time the matter had been heard or partially heard, counsel for the Town appearing and taking part, and presumptively with the knowledge of some of these plaintiffs, for they were petitioners. In bringing the suit no suggestion was made that the Town wrongfully appeared; the sole ground of complaint is that the expenses have been, and are to be, wrongfully paid. What reasons are there for this complaint?

We start now with the proposition conceded, or established, that the Town had a right to appear. Engrafted on that proposition is the claim that the Town has no right to pay the expense. That is the precise question. Of what avail is the right to defend, if the Town is deprived of the power to exercise the right? Towns can only appear by agent or attorney. Agents and attorneys do not ordinarily appear in such cases at their own expense. How are they to be obtained without compensation? It may be said that individuals interested may employ counsel. True, but what arises there in imposing upon individuals burdens which properly belong to the Town? Why cripple a town in maintaining its rights, by compelling it to depend upon voluntary contributions?

Let us examine this matter a little more in detail. The first proposition is to make two towns of one. That involves a division of the grand list. The Town is reduced, it may be, from a first class town in point of wealth and population, to one of the third or fourth class. It may be that every resident of the remaining town would prefer that the former state of things should continue. But his preferences are rendered practically unavailing by the inability of the Town to bring the matter to the attention of the Legislature. Is this right? True, each person may appear for himself. But an organized defense for and in behalf of the whole would be more effective and less expensive.

Again; the division of a town makes necessary the maintenance of two town organizations, with public buildings, instead of one.

not the Town employ and pay counsel to prevent such injury? The question answers itself. Moreover, this resolution apportioned the town deposit fund, the property of the old Town, its debts and liabilities, and also its duties and burdens. These are matters which do directly concern the Town obviously and necessarily. It is well nigh absurd to say that the Town has a right to appear and be heard, and yet has no power to pay the expense of such hearing. It seriously impairs, if it does not practically destroy, the right.

We have not overlooked the fact, suggested in the complaint, that the plaintiffs and others, residents in the new town, are taxed to pay the expenses of resisting the petition. There may be an apparent injustice in this; but we doubt if it is real. That was a matter for the Legislature rather than the court. The Legislature might have provided, as it did in the case of Beacon Falls (see 8 Spec. Laws, 54), that the Town of Derby as it now is should pay all such expenses. But it did not; on the contrary, the second section provides that "said new town shall pay its proportion of the present debts, liabilities, charges and expenses, suits, petitions and claims, already due and accrued, commenced and existing, against said Town of Derby," etc. That clearly includes all legitimate expense incurred in defending the petition for a new town. So that by its express language, as well as by its silence, the Legislature has recognized the duty of paying them by the Town of Derby as it was; and we cannot say that it is unjust. The Legislature may have had the best of reasons for its action.

Incidentally we remark that the Legislature, in the case of Beacon Falls, expressly recognized not only the right of the towns to defend such petitions, but also the power to pay the bills.

Prior to 1852 all petitions to the General Assembly of an adversary nature were required to be served on adverse parties in the ordinary way of serving civil process. Under that Statute the practice is believed to have been universal to serve the petition on the town or towns to be affected. The substitution of an order of notice by a judge of the superior court in 1852 made no change except in the mode of service. This is another recognition of the right of the town to be heard, and, by strong implication, of its power to pay the expenses.

Applications for the incorporation of new towns have been numerous and frequent in this State. We apprehend that few cases can be found in which the towns to be affected did not take action either for or against the application. The custom has been general, if not universal, for the towns to pay the expenses of such action. The fact that this question has not been raised heretofore, either in this court or in the superior court, affords some presumption against the plaintiffs' contention. A practice acquiesced in by the bar and the public for so long a time, is pretty good evidence of what the law is, and of what it ought to be.

We are not unimpressed by the cases cited in behalf of the plaintiffs from Massachusetts and Maine, and that they are inconsistent with the 7 L. R. A.

strained to say that neither the reasons nor the conclusions are satisfactory to us. In the more prominent case, Coolidge v. Brookline, 114 Mass. 592, one argument is that the town has no vested right to its territorial limits and therefore has no corporate duty to defend those limits against the State. That does not quite reach the question before us, which is not a question of duty, but of right and power. The Town may violate no duty to the State or to others if it makes no defense; but when its pecuniary interests are to be affected has it not a right to be heard? True, the Town has no vested right to its territorial limits in the sense that the Legislature may not at its pleasure change those limits; but will the Legislature for that reason deny it a hearing? The right of petition includes the right of remonstrance, and when the Legislature proposes to do an act detrimental to the Town, we have no doubt that in Massachusetts, as well as in Connecticut, a respectful remonstrance will be graciously received and fairly considered.

The opinion in that case concedes that the Town may defend its limits before all tribunals except the Legislature itself. This seems to imply that if others apply to the Legislature to enlarge or restrict the limits, the Town may not resist the change. If that is its meaning we cannot assent to it. We do not understand that the character of the tribunal before which a claim is made will at all affect the rights or the standing of the parties. We cannot believe that the Legislature is less willing to grant a full hearing to all parties in interest than are other tribunals. In that case the change in the boundary lines of Brookline is treated simply as a change in the public duties required of the Town. Here, as we have seen, the case goes much further and materially affects rights of property as well.

For these reasons the superior court is advised to render judgment for the defendants.

In this opinion the other Judges concurred, except Andrews, C. J., who dissented.

(February 17, 1880.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from leaving plaintiffs' employment or engaging in other business, in violation of a contract. Affirmed.

The action was brought by the William Rogers Manufacturing Company and the Rogers Cutlery Company, both joint-stock corporations located in Hartford, and carrying on business under one management, the manager being William H. Watrous.

On March 17, 1879, the following contract was entered into between Watrous, acting as agent of the plaintiff Companies, and the defendant.

"1. That said Companies will employ said Rogers in the business to be done by said Companies, according to the stipulations of said agreement, for the period of twenty-five years therein named, if said Rogers shall so long live and discharge the duties devolved upon him by said Watrous, as general agent and manager of the business to be done in common by said Companies, under the directions and to the satisfaction of such general agent and manager, it being understood that such duties may include traveling for said Companies, whenever in the judgment of said general agent the interests of the business will be thereby promoted.

"2. The said Companies agree to pay said Rogers for such services so to be rendered, at the rate of $1,000 per year for the first five years of such services, and thereafter the same or such larger salary as may be agreed upon by said Rogers and the directors of said Companies, said salary to be in full during said term of all services to be rendered by said Rogers, whether as an employe or an officer of said Companies, unless otherwise agreed.

"8. The said Rogers, in consideration of the foregoing, agrees that he will remain with and serve said Companies under the direction of said Watrous, as general agent and manager, including such duties as traveling for said Companies, as said general agent may devolve upon him, including also any duties as secretary or other officer of either or both of said Companies, as said Companies may desire to have him perform at the salary hereinbefore named, for the first five years, and at such other or further or different compensation thereafter, during the remainder of the twenty-five years, as he, the said Rogers, and the said Companies may agree upon.

"4. The said Rogers during said term stipulates and agrees that he will not be engaged, or allow his name to be employed, in any manner, in any other hardware, cutlery, flatware or hollow-ware business, either as manufacturer or seller, but will give, while he shall be so employed by said Companies, his entire time and services to the interests of said common business, diminished only by sickness and such reasonable absence for vacations or otherwise as may be agreed upon between him and said general agent."

The complaint set out the foregoing contract, and a contract of March 14, 1879, between the plaintiff Companies, by which they agreed for twenty-five years to do certain business on their joint account and under one management, the defendant then being secretary of the Rogers Cutlery Company, one of the plaintiffs. The complaint then proceeded as follows:

"After the execution of said last-named contract, in order to make it desirable to the defendant to become and continue permanently interested in and connected with the new business thereafter to be severally done by said corporations under the control of said Watrous as general manager thereof as provided in said contract, and to prevent him from allowing his name to be used in conflict therewith, and as a consideration for the performance of his own contract additional to those named therein, the said Watrous, in and by another contract with the defendant dated March 17, 1879, conveyed to the defendant the equitable interest and ownership in one hundred and sixty shares of the capital stock of the Rogers Cutlery Company aforesaid, upon the terms and conditions named in the agreement; and the defendant has since, and prior to the date of this complaint, received upon said shares of stock $2,995.99 in dividends, and still remains entitled to the receipt of continued dividends thereon and to full conveyance of said shares according to the terms of said contract.

"In accordance with said agreement the defendant entered the service of the plaintiffs, and therein has continued until the present time as the secretary of each of said Companies and in the discharge of the duties therein so as

Co. v. Ewing (N. Y.), ante, 881, where it is held that, "although equity will not ordinarily attempt to enforce contracts which cannot be carried out by the machinery of a court, it may nevertheless practically accomplish the same end by enjoining the breach of a negative promise." This was in relation to the contract of a base ball player, which gives the employer the right to "reserve" such player for the season next ensuing, and which simply gives clubs the right as against other clubs, to secure the services, if the parties can agree, but places no obligations on the player to enter into such contract. Hence players cannot be compelled to enter into such future contracts by a decree of specific performance, and consequently they cannot be enjoined from entering into them with other clubs.

after stated) have been executed both by the plaintiffs and the defendant; the salary of the defendant has by mutual agreement been raised to $2,000 per annum, and the services of the defendant, by reason of his familiarity with the plaintiffs' business and knowledge of their customers, acquired by his said employment since said 14th day of March, 1879, have become and now are of special value to the plaintiffs; and the plaintiffs desire that the defendant should continue in their employ and faithfully keep and perform all the obligations of said agreement.

"The plaintiffs are informed and believe, and therefore aver, that the defendant secretly and with intent that the fact should not be known to the plaintiffs, now is and for some time past has been conspiring and negotiating with sundry persons and corporations to the plaintiffs unknown, but all of whom, as the plaintiffs believe, are their competitors in business, with the purpose and intent of engaging, in connection with such persons and corporations, in the manufacture and sale of cutlery and silver-plated flat and hollow ware, and with the intent and purpose of allowing his name to be used and employed in connection with such business as a stamp on such silver-plated ware, and with the further intent of using in the interest of and for the advantage of such persons all his knowledge and information of the plaintiffs' business and of their customers which he has obtained by virtue of his employment as aforesaid. And the plaintiffs further say that the defendant threatens to leave their employ and to engage with such other parties in the business of manufacturing and selling cutlery and silver-plated flat and hollow ware, and to allow his name to be used and employed in connection with such business as a stamp upon such silver-plated goods and otherwise; all of which would be in violation of the defendant's agreement with the plaintiffs, and would deprive the plaintiffs of all the benefits and advantages secured to them by said agreement and to which they are justly entitled. And the plaintiffs aver that such conduct and doings of the defendant would occasion great and irreparable loss and damage to the business of the plaintiffs, and the use of defendant's name as a stamp or trade mark on said cutlery, silver-plated flat and hollow ware as aforesaid, would cause the same to so resemble the similar goods made and sold by the plaintiffs and stamped with the plaintiffs' stamps and trade-marks, of which the most prominent part is the word 'Rogers,' as that the same would be liable to be mistaken for those of the plaintiffs, and would be liable to be sold and would be sold as and for goods made and sold by the

When one partner contracts that he will exert himself for the benefit of the partnership, a court of equity cannot compel the specific performance of that part of the agreement; yet if he has also contracted that he will not carry on the same trade with other persons, the court will restrain him from breaking that part of his agreement.

Messrs. O. R. Ingersoll and F. L. Hungerford for appellee.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Contracts for personal service are matters for courts of law, and equity will not undertake a specific performance. 2 Kent, Com. 258, note b; Hamblin v. Dinnesford, 2 Elw. Ch. 529; Sanquirico v. Benedetti, 1 Barb. 315; Haight v. Badgley, 15 Barb. 499; Dellucastrol v. Coratti, 4 Paige, 264.

A specific performance in such cases is said to be impossible because obedience to the decree cannot be compelled by the ordinary processes of the court. Contracts for personal acts have been regarded as the most familiar illustrations of this doctrine, since the court cannot in any direct manner compel the party to render the service.

The courts in this country and in England formerly held that they could not negatively enforce the specific performance of such contracts by means of an injunction restraining their violation. 8 Wall, Act. and Def. 754; Rutland Marble Co. v. Rintey, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 340 [19 L. ed. 255]; Burton v. Marshall, 4 Gill (Md.) 487; De Pol v. Shike, 7 Robt. (N. Y.) 230; Kemble v. Kean, 6 Sim. 333; Bildwin v. Society for Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, 6 Sim. 393; Fothergill v. Rowland, L. R. 17 Eq. 132.

The courts in both countries have, however, receded somewhat from the latter conclusion, and it is now held that where a contract stipulates for special, unique or extraordinary personal services or acts, or where the services to

Wagner*, 1 De G. M. & G. 604; South Wales R. Co. v. Wythes, 5 DeG. M. & G. 880; Montague v. Plockton, L. R. 18 Eq. 189.

The contract between the defendant and the plaintiffs is made a part of the complaint. The services which the defendant was to perform for the plaintiffs are not specified therein, otherwise than that they were to be such as should be devolved upon him by the general manager; "it being understood that such duties may include traveling for said Companies whenever in the judgment of said general agent the interests of the business will be thereby promoted;" and also "including such duties as traveling for said Companies as said general agent may devolve upon him, including also any duties as secretary or other officer of either or both of said Companies as said Companies may desire to have him perform." These services, while they may not be material and mechanical, are certainly not purely intellectual, nor are they special, or unique, or extraordinary; nor are they so peculiar or individual that they could not be performed by any person of ordinary intelligence and fair learning. If this was all there was in the contract it would be almost too plain for argument that the plaintiffs should not have an injunction.

The plaintiffs however insist that the negative part of the contract, by which the defendant stipulated and agreed that he would not be engaged in or allow his name to be employed in any manner in any other hardware, cutlery, flat-ware or hollow-ware business, either as a manufacturer or seller, fully entitles them to an injunction against its violation. They aver in the complaint, on information and belief, that the defendant is planning with certain of their competitors to engage with them in business, with the intent and purpose of allowing his name to be used or employed

If the plaintiffs owned the name of the defendant as a trade-mark they could have no difficulty in protecting their ownership. But they make no such claim; and all arguments or analogies drawn from the law of trade marks may be laid wholly out of the case.

There is no averment in the complaint that the plaintiffs are entitled to use, or that in fact they do use, the name of the defendant as a stamp on the goods of their own manufacture; nor any averment that such use, if it exists, is of any value to them. So far as the court is informed the defendant's name on such goods as the plaintiffs manufacture is of no more value than the names of Smith or Stiles or John Doe. There is nothing from which the court can see that the use of the defendant's name by the plaintiffs is of any value to them, or that its use as a stamp by their competitors would do them any injury other than such as might grow out of a lawful business rivalry. If by reason of extraneous facts the name of the defendant does have some special and peculiar value as a stamp on their goods, or its use as a stamp on goods manufactured by their rivals would do them some special injury, such facts ought to have been set out, so that the court might pass upon them. In the absence of any allegation of such facts we must assume that none exist.

The plaintiffs also aver that the defendant intends to make known to their rivals the knowledge of their business, of their customers, etc., which he has obtained while in their employ. But here they have not shown facts which bring the case within any rule that would require an employé to be enjoined from disclosing business secrets which he has learned in the course of his employment and which he has contracted not to divulge. Peabody v. Norfolk, 98 Mass. 452.

KE-TUC-E-MUN-GUAH, Appt.,

v.

Samuel McCURE

(.....Ind.....)

1. An Indian is not incapable of giving a valid promissory note by reason of the fact that he belongs to a band which is governed by ancient Indian customs and retains a tribal organization, unless it grows out of some contract prohibited by law.
2. The fact that the lands of a defendant, who is an Indian, are not liable to levy and sale under a judgment, is no ground for refusing a judgment against him.
3. Rendering judgment for a sum in excess of that covered by the prayer of the complaint is not ground for reversal, where it does not exceed the amount due, as the case.

plaint might have been amended if the objection had been made in the lower court.

(March 15, 1900.)

APPEAL, by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Grant County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.
Mr. George W. Harvey for appellant.
Mr. Alvah Taylor for appellee.

Coffey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit by the appellee against the appellant based upon a promissory note dated March 7, 1872, and due one day after date. The appellant answered, first admitting the execution of the note in suit, but averring that the appellee ought not to recover on the same because he is a member of the Miami tribe of Indians; that he was at the date of said note and at the time the debt for which it was given accrued, to wit, in 1870 and 1871, and has at all times since continued to be, up to the present time, a member of the band of Me-ching-gomesia, and has at all times been, remained and resided upon a reservation containing 6,400 acres of land, situate in the Counties of Grant and Wabash, in the State of Indiana, reserved by the Miami Indians in their Treaty of 1838 with the United States to the band of Me-tosmia, which reserve is again referred to in the Treaty of 1840 between the same parties, by which, as amended by the Senate, the United States agreed to convey said land by patent to Me-ching-gomesia, in trust for his band, who have ever since remained upon said lands; that said Me-ching-gomesia remained the chief of said band until his death, which occurred in the year 1877; that immediately upon his death the said band, in accordance with their ancient customs, proceeded to and did select William Pe-conga, one of said band, as their chief, who is still acting as such; that up to the 1st day of January, 1881, they lived upon their said lands, practicing and adhering to their ancient manners and customs, holding but little intercourse with the whites from choice; that they settled their troubles and disputes among themselves, without resorting to the courts of the State; that in their intercourse with each other they speak their own language; that the greater part of said tribe cannot speak the English language intelligently; that their tribal organization still remains unaltered; that they hold their councils for the same purposes as in former times, and are governed by their ancient customs; that said band did not go into the courts of the State for any redress until the year 1881; that they are a distinct people; that they did not, until the 1st day of January, 1881, participate in our civil or political privileges, nor were they in any way regarded as members of our body politic, having no right to vote or participate in our elections, or to serve in any official capacity; that they were, in every particular, wards of the United States, and not bound by, or amenable to, the laws of the State of Indiana; that the defendant has at all times since his birth remained with, and participated in the ancient manners, customs and rights of, said band, as one of its members, and fully acted with said band, taking upon himself and exercising no other or different rights or privileges than the band, as a whole, used or exercised, as heretofore stated; that he has never at any time since the 1st day of January, 1881, or since the execution of said note, agreed or contracted or consented to pay said debt, or in any manner acknowledged the same, but has at all times repudiated and refused to pay the same, or any part thereof.

The second paragraph of the answer avers, substantially, the same facts as those set out in the first paragraph, with the additional averments that the land reserved to the band of Miami Indians, of which the appellant is a member, has been partitioned among the members of said band under an Act of Congress, by means of which certain of said lands have been set off to the appellant in severalty; that the debt for which the note in suit was executed accrued in 1870; and that his lands so set off to him under the Act of Congress are not liable to levy and sale for the payment of said debt. Prayer that the appellant be enjoined from levying any execution that may issue on a judgment rendered upon the note in suit upon said land, or from interfering with the same in any manner. To these answers the court sustained a demurrer, and the appellant excepted. A trial by the court resulted in a finding and judgment for appellee, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

The assignment of errors calls in question the correctness of the ruling of the circuit court in sustaining the demurrer to these answers, as well as the propriety of the ruling in overruling a motion for a new trial. It is earnestly contended by the appellant that the band of Indians of which he is a member are wards of the United States government, and that by reason thereof each member of said band is under legal disability, and is incapable of making a binding contract. It is admitted by the appellee, as we understand his brief, that the band to which the appellant belongs is, in a sense, the ward of the government of the United States; but it is denied that any law exists creating a general legal disability, and that the individual members of said band are not prohibited from contracting debts, and making such contracts as the one now in suit. As all persons not under legal disabilities are capable of making and entering into binding contracts, it follows that the note in suit is a binding obligation, unless it can be shown that the appellant, at the time of its execution, was under duress or some legal disability, or unless it can be shown that the making of such note was prohibited by some law, or contrary to the public policy. In support of his contention, the appellant cites the cases of Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 80 U. S. 5 Pet. 1 [8 L. ed. 25]; Worcester v. Georgia, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 515 [8 L. ed. 483], and Goodell v. Jackson, 20 Johns. 693.

While it was held in the case of Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, supra, that the Cherokee Nation was a separate State, a distinct political society, separated from others, capable of managing its own affairs and governing itself, it was held, also, that it was not a foreign State, in the sense of the Constitution of the United States, and could not maintain an action as such in the courts of the United States.

The case of Worcester v. Georgia, supra, was a prosecution against Worcester, a white missionary, who resided within the territory reserved by treaty with the government of the United States to the Cherokee Nation. The prosecution was instituted under a law of the State of Georgia making it a penal offense to reside in that territory without a license from the governor of the State. It was held that the Cherokee Nation was a distinct community, occupying its own territory, with boundaries accurately described, in which the laws of the State of Georgia could have no force, and which the citizens of Georgia had no right to enter, except with the assent of the Cherokees themselves, or in conformity with the treaties, and with the Acts of Congress, as the whole intercourse with that nation was, by the Constitution and laws, vested in the United States.

While the learned chancellor in the case of Goodell v. Jackson, 20 Johns. supra, gives a comprehensive review of the Acts of Congress relating to the various tribes of Indians, and the treaties made with them, and reaches the conclusion that they are to be regarded as separate and distinct nations, subject, however, to the protection of the general government, the case depended wholly upon the statutes of the State of New York; and the questions there adjudicated can have no bearing upon the question now here for determination. Indeed, there would seem to be no doubt that the different Indian tribes residing within the territory of the United States, while they keep up their tribal relations, are to be regarded, in the absence of some Act of Congress upon the subject, as separate and distinct nations. The government has always treated with them as such; and, when engaged in war against the whites, they have never been treated as rebels, subject to the law of treason, but, on the contrary, have always been regarded and treated as separate and independent nations, entitled to the rights of ordinary belligerents, and subject to no other penalties. Acting upon the theory that the Indians, maintaining their tribal relations, residing on reservations secured to them by treaties with the United States government, constitute separate and distinct nations, and following the law as announced in the case of Worcester v. Georgia, it was held by this court, in the case of Me-shing-go-me-sia v. State, 36 Ind. 810, that this State had no power to tax the lands reserved to the tribe to which the appellant belongs. But none of these cases decide that an Indian belonging to a tribe or nation has not the power to make a contract of the kind now before us, and our attention has not been called to any law which prohibits him from making such contract. Very many of the Acts of Congress, as well as the adjudicated cases, proceed upon the theory that an Indian may bind himself by an ordinary executory contract, and may contract debts. Most, if not all, of the Acts of Congress granting annuities to the Indians provide that such Indians shall not be bound by any contract whereby such annuity is disposed of or pledged before the same is actually paid by the government.

By Rev. Stat. U. S. 1878, p. 307, it is provided that no agreement shall be made by any person with any individual Indian, not a citizen of the United States, for the payment or delivery of any money, or other thing of value, in present or prospective, or for the granting or procuring any privilege to him or any other person, in consideration of services for said Indians relative to their lands, or to any claim growing out of, or in reference to, annuities, installments or other moneys, claims, demands or things, under laws or treaties with the United States, or official acts of any officers thereof, or in any way connected with or due from the United States, unless such contract or agreement be executed and approved as therein provided. It does not appear that the contract in suit falls within the class of contracts prohibited by this Act of Congress. Unless it appears that such contract falls within the provisions of this Statute, or some other statute, 7 L. R. A. rendering it illegal, it must be held to be valid and binding. Godfrey v. Scott, 70 Ind. 259.

In our opinion, the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the first paragraph of the answer.

The second paragraph of the answer does not state a defense to any part of the plaintiff's cause of action. The fact that the lands set off to the appellant may not be liable to levy and sale for the payment of the appellee's judgment furnishes no sufficient reason why judgment should not be rendered. The appellee may be able to collect his debt without resort to the land. As there is no pretense that the appellee is threatening to levy upon the land described in the answer, there is no ground for an injunction. Furthermore, the pleading is not a cross-bill seeking affirmative relief, but is an answer. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to this answer.

The only matter urged under the assignment of error calling in question the action of the court in overruling the motion for a new trial is that the judgment exceeds the amount claimed in the complaint. It is not claimed that the judgment exceeds the amount due on the note, but it is contended that the court erred in rendering judgment for a sum in excess of that covered by the prayer of the complaint. This contention cannot be maintained. The appellee could have amended the prayer of his complaint at any time, and this court will regard the amendment as having been made in the circuit court. Carpenter v. She'don, 23 Ind. 259; Webb v. Thompson, 23 Ind. 423.

There is no error in the record.

1. The court may require the jury to return a special verdict at the request of one of the parties to the action, although he has previously requested the court to instruct the jury in writing and has entered upon a discussion of the questions of law to be embraced in such instruction.
2. The Statute prohibiting the making of contracts by parol which are not to be performed within one year has no application to a contract which has been fully performed by one of the parties.

NOTE.—Statute of Frauds: contracts not to be performed within one year.

A parol contract not relating to land, and not to be performed within the year, is not enforceable. It is not taken out of the Statute by a part performance, as that equitable doctrine applies only to contracts in relation to land. Osborne v. Kimball (Kan.) 21 Pac. Rep. 108; Wolke v. Fleming, 1 West. Rep. 186, 103 Ind. 105.

Oral contracts not to be performed within a year are not enforceable; yet a contract to sell stock at the end of three years at a certain price, and also that it may be called at any time before the expiration of three years, is valid although not in writing, because its performance within one year is transaction, some of which are within the Statute of Frauds; and the others not, and they are of such a nature that they can reasonably be considered as separate, the former will be enforced although the latter are avoided.

6. A person's title under a valid contract for the purchase of an interest in brood mares, which is coupled with a voidable contract as to their keeping, will not be affected by the avoidance of the latter contract.

6. Where partnership property is to be kept for the purpose of carrying on a particular business and not for sale, neither partner has power to make a sale of the entire property.

7. Declarations as to the ownership of property, made by a person in possession thereof, are admissible in evidence upon an issue as to such ownership as part of the res gesta.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wallace, Baird & Chase, for appellant;

Contracts prohibited by subd. 5 of § 1 of the Statute of Frauds are not, by part performance, taken out of the Statute.

This was an action by the appellant against the appellee to recover the possession of forty brood mares described in the complaint. The complaint alleges that he is the owner and entitled to the possession of the property, and that the appellee unlawfully detains the possession thereof from him.

The cause was admitted to a jury, who returned the following special verdict:

A parol contract to serve a company as treasurer for the term of five years for a percentage of the profits, although not enforceable by action, is not void, and, in so far as voluntarily executed by entering upon and continuing in the service, its terms may be referred to and considered in determining the measure of compensation for the service. La Du-King Mfg. Co. v. La Du, 36 Minn. 472.

Templeton was the absolute owner of the forty mares in controversy in this case, and on that day bargained to the defendant, Sheets, a one-half interest in said mares, at and for the price of $45 for each of said mares, said mares in said bargain being valued at $90 each.

By the terms of said sale said defendant was to have possession and care and control of said mares, and was to keep the same until March 1, 1891.

Said Templeton was to furnish pasture for the same until October 1, 1887, after which the feed for said animals was to be furnished at the equal expense of said Templeton and said defendant.

Said defendant, from the time of making said bargain, was to look after and have the control and possession of said mares in the pasture furnished by said Templeton, up to October 1, 1887, and was thereafter to continue to feed and take care of said animals and to have the possession of the same. Said Sheets was to pay said Templeton interest at 7 per cent on the purchase price of said mares from October 1, 1887, and was to have the option to pay said purchase money when he saw proper on or before March 1, 1891. On March 1, 1891, the interest of said parties in said mares, and the proceeds thereof, was to be equal, after accounting to each party for his portion of the expense, and also after payment to Templeton by the defendant of the purchase price for the one-half interest thereof, with interest, if the same had not been previously paid.

By the terms of said bargain, said mares were to be kept exclusively for breeding purposes, and were not to be worked or sold, broke or traded by either party prior to March 1, 1891, except by consent.

Said bargain was not in writing.

Pursuant to said contract, said Templeton, on the same day that it was made, to wit, about April 8, 1887, delivered possession of said mares to said Sheets, who remained in the possession and care of the same, having the same in a pasture furnished by said Templeton, in said county until the 16th day of June, 1887, when said Templeton and said plaintiff, without the knowledge or consent of said Sheets, took said mares from said pasture, and placed them in a pasture of the plaintiff, about half a mile distant from where they were taken.

The possession of said property was taken by said Lowman, under a sale made to him by said Templeton, on the 16th day of June, 1887, on which day said Templeton sold said property to said Lowman for the sum of $3,400 to be paid by said Lowman in six months after said date, which was evidenced by a promissory note, executed by plaintiff to Templeton, payable in a bank in this State, which said note is still held by said Templeton, and is still wholly unpaid.

Said Sheets had no notice, knowledge or information of said sale by Templeton to the plaintiff until after the same was made, and the possession of said property taken by the plaintiff as aforesaid; nor did he ever afterwards consent to the same.

On the 22d day of June, 1887, said defendant L. R. A.

him, said defendant's, own pasture, on Fowler and Van Natta's farm in said county, the same being about four miles from the pasture where said animals were when taken by the plaintiff as aforesaid, and about the same distance from the plaintiff's said pasture, from which they were taken by the defendant as aforesaid.

While said animals were in the possession of the defendant as aforesaid, said plaintiff, on the 22d day of June, 1887, before the commencement of this action, demanded said property of said defendant, but said defendant refused to deliver him the possession thereof.

Said plaintiff on the same day commenced this action, and upon a writ of replevin herein issued and upon the plaintiff's undertaking, approved by the sheriff, said sheriff, on said writ, delivered said property to the plaintiff, who, by virtue of said delivery of possession, has since retained and is now in the possession of said property.

Said property is now of the aggregate value of $3,400. At the same time of making the sale of a half interest in said mares to said Sheets, said defendant and said Templeton entered into a bargain whereby said Templeton was to lease to said Sheets 800 acres of real estate, owned by said Templeton, in said county, for the term of three years, to commence on the 1st day of March, 1888.

Said lands were the north half of each of two adjoining sections owned by said Templeton, one lying immediately east of the other, and the south-west quarter of said east section—the precise location of said lands so leased was well understood and agreed to by the parties at the time of making said bargain.

By the terms of said bargain said land was to be cultivated in corn, oats, pasture and meadow, as said Sheets might determine, and as rent for the same said Sheets was to deliver to said Templeton, on said premises, one third of the corn raised thereon in the crib, one third of the oats in the bin and three fifths of the hay in the stack, and to pay $2.50 per acre for all the pasture except thirty acres, for which no charge was to be made.

Said Templeton was, before March 1, 1888, to move a house from a designated part of said premises to another designated part thereof, and to put the same in a tenable condition, at an expense of not exceeding $300.

At the same time that Templeton sold a half interest in said mares as aforesaid, and at the same time that he leased said defendant said real estate as aforesaid, said Templeton and defendant entered into a bargain whereby it was agreed by and between them that such portions of the hay and grain as should be raised upon said leased premises by said defendant, as the parties should determine, should be fed to stock, which stock was to be purchased from year to year by said parties, with money to be borrowed by them jointly, and to be taken care of by said defendant on said premises, the expense of feeding the same to be borne by Templeton and the defendant equally, and the net profits thereof to be divided between them equally.

Said mares were also to be kept on said leased premises after March 1, 1888.

None of said bargains were in writing.

Said sale of a half interest in said mares, by said Templeton to said defendant, would not have been made if said Templeton had not at the same time leased said defendant said real estate as aforesaid; but said sale of said half interest in said mares to said defendant, and said lease of said real estate, were in no wise dependent upon said other contract, and would have been made though said other contract had not been made.

If, upon the foregoing facts, the law is with the defendant, then we find for the defendant—that the property in controversy should be returned to him, or, if return thereof cannot be had, that he should have judgment for one half the value of the mares described in the complaint. Thos. S. Lamb, Foreman.

But if, upon the foregoing facts, the law is with the plaintiff, then we find for the plaintiff, that he keep and retain possession of the property in controversy, and that he recover from the defendant one cent for his damages herein.

Thos. S. Lamb, Foreman.

The appellant moved the court for judgment in his favor on the special verdict, which was overruled. The court sustained a motion by the appellee for judgment in his favor on this verdict, and rendered judgment for a return of the property.

The errors assigned are:

1. That the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for judgment in his favor on the special verdict of the jury.

2. That the court erred in overruling the appellant's motion for a venire de novo.

3. That the court erred in overruling the appellant's motion for a new trial.

4. That the court erred in overruling the appellant's motion to arrest the judgment.

5. That the court erred in sustaining the appellee's motion for judgment in his favor on the special verdict of the jury.

The first objection with which we are met is that the court erred in directing the jury to return a special verdict.

It appears by the record that after the close of the evidence in the cause each of the parties requested the court to instruct the jury in writing, and to indicate before the argument, what instructions would be given. After the close of the argument, in the effort to settle on the instruction, but before the court had announced its conclusion, the appellee requested that the jury be required to return a special verdict, which request was granted.

It is claimed by the appellant that, by requesting the court to instruct the jury in writing, and by entering upon the discussion of the questions of law to be embraced in such instructions, that the appellee waived his right to a special verdict, and that the court for that reason erred in granting his request.

It is unnecessary to decide whether it would have been error in the court to refuse the request of the appellee for a special verdict, coming at the time it did, but it was certainly not error to grant it. Indeed, the court had the right to require the jury to return a special verdict without any request from either party. Weatherly v. Higgins, 6 Ind. 73.

It is earnestly contended by the appellant, in an able brief, that the contract found by the jury is within the Statute of Frauds, and that it is therefore void.

It is found by the jury, as we understand their verdict, that the contract to purchase stock to be fed on the farm has no connection with the other agreements between the parties, and hence that agreement does not call for any consideration at our hands.

The contracts under which the question for decision arises are: (1) the contract by which the appellant sold to the appellee a one-half interest in the property in controversy for an agreed price, and delivered to him the possession; (2) the contract by which the appellant leased to the appellee the land described in the verdict for the term of three years; and (3) the contract, by the terms of which the appellee was to keep the mares in controversy and breed them for a period of more than one year.

The sale and delivery of a one-half interest in the mares in controversy is not within the Statute of Frauds, because it was fully executed by Templeton.

The Statute prohibiting the making of contracts not to be performed within one year has no application to contracts which have been fully performed by one of the parties. Brown, Stat. Fr. § 287; Donellan v. Read, 3 Barn. & Ad. 809; Smith v. Neale, 2 C. B. N. S. 67; Holbrook v. Armstrong, 10 Me. 31; Eell v. Hewitt, 24 Ind. 280; Wolke v. Fleming, 103 Ind. 105, 1 West. Rep. 106.

Nor is the lease of the land within the Statute of Frauds, as the Statute expressly exempts leases for a period not exceeding three years. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4904.

This is not an action by either party to enforce the contract. A contract within the Statute of Frauds is not void, but merely voidable. Schierman v. Beckett, 88 Ind. 52; Day v. Wilson, 83 Ind. 463.

In the latter case cited it was held that where a party had paid money on a parol contract for the purchase of land, the money could not be recovered back unless the vendor refused to convey.

It being settled that the contract for the sale of the property in controversy was not within the Statute of Frauds, and that it vested the title to the undivided one half of the property in the appellee, the question arises as to what is the effect of the repudiation of the agreement to keep the property for a period of more than one year for breeding purposes, by the appellant, when the appellee is ready and willing to carry out the contract on his part.

We think, for the purposes of this case at least, that it must be held that the agreement to keep the mares for breeding purposes until 1891, each party furnishing a part of the feed, with postponement of a settlement to that date, is within the Statute of Frauds, unless it be held that such contract creates a partnership. Stephenson v. Arnold, 89 Ind. 426; Wolke v. Fleming, supra.

If the contract between the parties created a partnership, then, according to some of the

But conceding that the Statute applies to this contract, did the repudiation of it by Templeton divest the title of the appellee to the property in controversy? We are of the opinion that the contract to keep the mares involved in this suit until 1891 is so far separated from, and independent of, the other contracts found by the jury, that the repudiation of it by the appellant cannot deprive the appellee of the benefits he has acquired under the other contracts, which are not within the Statute of Frauds, without his consent. Where there are a number of contracts made at the same time, and as parts of the same transaction, some of which are within the Statute of Frauds and the others not, and they are of such a nature that they can reasonably be considered as separate, those which are not within the Statute will be enforced though the others may fall within the Statute. Brown, Stat. Fr. § 148 et seq.

In such cases it is not so important to ascertain whether the one contract would not have been entered into without the other, as to ascertain whether they are in their nature separate and distinct. In this case, if the contract had been for the leasing of the land described in the verdict for the period of three years, coupled with the agreement on the part of Templeton to build a house on the premises during the second year, it could not be reasonably contended that Templeton could defeat the appellee's tenancy by a refusal to erect the house, though it should plainly appear that the one contract would not have been made without the other. So we think Templeton could not divest the title of the appellee in the mares in controversy by a refusal to carry out the agreement in relation to keeping them until 1891. It is probably true that the appellee could not maintain an action against him for such refusal, but we do not think this fact affects the title which the appellee acquired by a contract which is not affected by the Statute of Frauds.

Having reached the conclusion that the appellee is the owner of an undivided interest in the property in controversy, it follows that appellant cannot maintain this action unless he acquired the whole title to the same by his purchase from Templeton. Mills v. Matott, 43 Ind. 248; Lucen v. Weaver, 49 Ind. 873; Branch v. Wiseman, 51 Ind. 1; Schenck v. Long, 67 Ind. 579.

It is contended by the appellant that Templeton and appellee were partners, and that, as such, either partner had the right to sell the property owned by the firm and confer a good

v. Sturderant, 4 B. Mon. 453; Cayton v. Hardy, 27 Mo. 586; Mussey v. Holt, 24 N. H. 243; Hudson v. McKeneis, 1 E. D. Smith, 858.

Mr. Bates, in his valuable work on Partnerships, in treating the subject in the section above cited, says: "But I have no doubt but that the power of sale must be confined to those things held for sale, and that the scope of the business does not include the sale of the property held for the purposes of business and to make a profit out of it, and that this only is the true rule."

It follows from what we have said that the court did not err in overruling the motion of the appellant for judgment in his favor on the special verdict of the jury, nor did the court err in sustaining the motion of the appellee for judgment in his favor on said verdict.

It is contended that the special verdict before us does not find on all the issues in the case, and for that reason the court erred in overruling the motion for a venire de novo; but we think the verdict covers all the issues presented by the pleadings in the cause, and that it is not subject to the objection urged against it.

The court, over the objection of the appellant, permitted the appellee to prove certain declarations, made by himself, in relation to the ownership of the property in controversy. But these declarations were made while in possession of the property, and under the rule as settled in the cases of Bunnell v. Studebaker, 48 Ind. 838; Kuhns v. Gates, 92 Ind. 66; McConnell v. Hannah, 96 Ind. 102, and Craigton v. Hoppie, 99 Ind. 800, it was admissible as part of the res gestae. Durham v. Shannon, 116 Ind. 408.

Finally it is contended by the appellant that the verdict of the jury is not supported by the evidence. We have read the evidence carefully, and while it is conflicting, there is evidence in the record fairly tending to support the verdict. Its weight was for the jury. We cannot disturb the verdict on the weight of the evidence. We find no error in the record for which the judgment should be reversed.

of special circumstances, yet such circumstances may exist as to make it proper for equity to entertain such action on their behalf.

2. Heirs of a deceased partner cannot call the surviving partner to account, although they have shown that he has paid all the partnership debts, where it also appears that the estate of the decedent was indebted to him, unless they further make it appear that he has in his hands partnership property in excess of the amount required to reimburse himself.
3. A sale of land by executors under a will giving them power to sell and convey it, either at public or private sale, with or without appraisement, on such terms as to them shall seem best, is not affected by a statute regulating the conduct of sales of land directed by will to be sold, and prescribing the manner of giving notice, conveying, etc., "unless by the terms of the will different directions are given."
4. The sale of a deceased partner's interest in partnership real estate is authorized by a will giving power to settle, adjust and compromise all debts owing by the testator, to make settlements with his former partners and to sell and convey any or all of his real estate in order to pay and satisfy debts against his estate.
5. A surviving partner may purchase the interest of his deceased partner in the partnership business, including partnership real estate, from his properly authorized legal representative, where the transaction is fairly entered into.
6. An executor may convey his testator's interest in partnership real estate to his surviving partner in consideration of an agreement by the latter to pay the partnership debts, where the will authorized him to make settlements with testator's partners of all matters pertaining to the partnership business, to adjust, settle and compromise all debts, claims and demands against the estate and in his discretion to sell and convey so much of testator's real estate as should be deemed necessary to satisfy his debts.

7. A court of equity will not disturb a settlement and final accounting of partnership matters, actually consummated between a surviving partner and the executor of the deceased partner duly empowered to that end, until it is impeached as fraudulent or unfair or unless collusion between the executor and surviving partner is shown, although the latter thereby became the purchaser of the deceased partner's share.
8. After the unexplained lapse of fourteen years a settlement and accounting in regard to partnership matters between the surviving partner and the deceased partner's executor will not be opened up, although the settlement was irregularly made.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. O. T. Boas, W. W. Herod and F. Winter, for appellants:

Provision for continuance in copartnership articles.

A provision that, in the event of the death of either partner, it is to be optional with the survivor whether the copartnership shall continue, is not an agreement binding on both parties, and cannot be enforced against the heirs of one. Hart v. Anger, 38 La. Ann. 341.

Where articles of partnership provide that, on the death of a partner during the partnership term, his executor shall be entitled to the place of the deceased partner in the firm, with the capital of the deceased partner in the firm business, if he elects to come in, he comes in with all the rights and liabilities of a partner, and is personally liable as a partner for debts contracted in the business. Wild v. Davenport, 5 Cent. Rep. 76, 48 N. J. L. 129.

Articles which simply provide that his capital shall be left in the business until the end of the partnership term do not require the admission of the executor of a deceased partner in the management or control of the business; and if he does not personally engage in the business he will not be personally liable for debts, though he leaves the testator's capital in the business. Ibid.

A stipulation that if either of the partners should die before the expiration of the stipulated period, "the surviving partner shall continue the business for the unexpired term," gives the survivor the power to employ all the partnership effects without material change in the business for the residue of the term, but confers on him no authority to fasten any new debt or liability on the estate of the deceased partner. Vincent v. Martin, 79 Ala. 540.

A bill for an account against a surviving member of the firm, to ascertain the value of the testator's interest, may be maintained in the name of the executor as plaintiff; and this valuation will include profits on the share until its purchase, although the share was taken at an appraisement previously made. DeHaven v. Anjer (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 530.

Agreement that survivor shall continue the business.

Under a partnership agreement that upon the death of either partner the business shall be conducted by the survivor, the estate of a deceased partner is not liable for the debts thereafter contracted. Butcher v. Hepworth, 115 N. Y. 330.

In such case the executors of a deceased partner do not become partners in their representative capacity. Ibid.

Continuance of business under provisions of the will.

A partner may, by his will, provide that the partnership shall continue notwithstanding his death; and if it is consented to by the surviving partner, it becomes obligatory. Burwell v. Cawood, 43 U. S. 2 How. 560 (11 L. ed. 878).

The testator may bind his general assets for all the debts of the partnership contracted after his death, or he may limit the liability to funds already embarked, or to any specific investments, and release his general assets from liability to creditors. Ibid.

Nothing but the most clear and unambiguous language, that the testator intended that his general assets be liable for all debt contracted in the continued trade after his death, will justify the court in arriving at such conclusion. Ibid.

Appellants had an interest in the real estate in controversy as heirs-at-law of John Jack, deceased, and they have the right to maintain an action for the protection of such interest.

As between the personal representatives and the heirs of a deceased partner, his share of the surplus of the real estate of the partnership, after all its debts are paid, and the equitable claims of the members are adjusted, will be considered and treated as real estate.

On general principles a surviving partner is the owner of the partnership assets; he has the legal title, and it is only in a court of equity that he is treated as trustee. Re Sauls, 5 Fed. On the dissolution of a partnership by the death of one of its members, the surviving partner is alone suable at law for partnership debts, and is entitled to the possession and control of the firm assets to enable him to discharge the debts and to settle the affairs of the partnership. *Kirkpatrick v. An account and settlement by the executor of a deceased partner with the surviving partner of the partnership affairs are binding as between the surviving partner and the persons interested in the estate of the deceased partner, and cannot be impeached save on the ground of fraud.

As a general rule surviving or solvent partners cannot take the assets of the firm at a valuation as of the time of the dissolution. They have a right to the possession and control of the assets, but it is for the purpose only of satisfying the liabilities of the firm and turning the effects into money in the manner most advantageous to the interests of all concerned. King v. Leighton, supra; McClellan v. Kennard, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 342.

Where the surviving partner of a firm becomes insolvent and his individual creditors levy attachments on the partnership property, the partnership creditors may come into equity to enforce their right to priority of payment out of the partnership assets. *Farley v. This suit was instituted by Emily E. Valentine, Marilla M. Little, Parmelia R. Gilbert, Mary E. Wood and Florence T. Howe, the children and heirs at-law of John Jack, late of Delaware County, deceased, against Jacob H. Wyser.

The questions for decision arise upon the complaint, from which we summarize the following facts:

John Jack, father of the plaintiff below, died testate in the month of October, 1859. At and before that date he was in partnership with the #### Equitable rule as to partnership assets.

The partnership property of the firm shall be applied to the payment of the partnership debts, to the exclusion of creditors of the individual members of the firm. Farnett v. Tallmadge, 18 Abb. Pr. 52; Bowen v. Billings, 13 Neb. 44; Hutchinson v. Smith, 7 Paige, 28; Story, Eq. § 675.

And creditors of the latter are to be first paid out of the separate effects of their debtor, before the partnership creditors can claim anything therefrom. Bowen v. Billings, 13 Neb. 44; Jackson v. Cornell, 1 Sandf. Ch. 330, 3 N. Y. Legal Obs. 8; Farnett v. Tallmadge, 18 Abb. Pr. 52; Wilder v. Keeler, 3 Paige, 157; Payne v. Matthews, 5 Paige, 12; North River Bank v. Stewart, 4 Bradf. 257, 4 Abb. Pr. 400; Butts v. Genung, 3 Paige, 254.

Partnership property is a trust fund to the extent of partnership liabilities to be applied in satisfaction of the same. Boop v. Heron, 15 Neb. 30; Innes v. Lansing, 7 Paige, 228; Whitewright v. Stimpson, 2 Barb. 373.

But it has never been supposed that the creditors could resort to equity to reach the property, when there has been a wrongful disposition of the assets, until the remedy at law has been exhausted. Walser v. Soligman, 21 Blatchf. 121, 13 Fed. Rep. 416; Dunlevy v. Tallmadge, 22 N. Y. 457.

The creditors of a partnership come in through the medium of the partner and his equities. Robb v. Stevens, Clarke, Ch. 197.

defendant Jacob H. Wysor, the two composing the firm of Wysor & Jack. The testator was also a member of the firm of Wysor, Jack & Kline, which was composed of the above-named Jacob H. Wysor, John Jack and William B. Kline.

This last named firm was engaged in the milling business and owned a flouring mill, together with sixty-five acres of land adjacent, each member being the owner of an undivided one third of the business and property. The business of the firm of Wysor, Jack & Kline was in no way connected with that of Wysor & Jack, the last-named firm being the owner of 880 acres of land which constituted part of the firm assets, in which each partner had an equal interest. The character of the business of Wysor & Jack does not distinctly appear, but the land owned by them is treated by both parties as partnership property.

By the first, second and third clauses of his will, the testator appointed executors to carry the will into execution, made provision for his wife by giving her a life estate in his real estate, and expressed a desire that she should be admitted into the firm and continue the business as a partner with Wysor and Kline, his former associates in the milling business.

The fourth and fifth clauses of his will read as follows:

"4th. I will and direct that my said executors, and, in case of the death or failure to serve of either, the survivor of them, shall adjust, settle and compromise any and all debts, claims or demands due to or from me, according to the best of their or his judgment, without any further authority from any court or jurisdiction whatever; and further, that they shall make settlement with my said partners, and each of them, of the partnership affairs, and of the profits heretofore arising therefrom, together with any matters of dealing between myself and them, or either of them, in manner according to his or their judgment, without any further authority from any court whatever.

"5th. I do further will and direct that my said executors, or in case of the failure from any cause of either to serve, then the remaining executor, shall sell and convey so much of my personal or real estate, at either public or private sale, with or without appraisement, on such terms, at such place and in such manner as to him or them shall seem best, as may be necessary to pay and satisfy all my just debts, reserving, however, to my said wife the title and possession of the house and grounds where I now live, otherwise selling such parcels, the sale of which will least injure the remainder."

As to the remainder of his property, after the termination of the life estate of the widow, the testator died intestate. After the testator died, Wysor, as surviving partner of the firm of Wysor & Jack, and Wysor & Kline, as surviving partners of Wysor, Jack & Kline, continued in possession of the property of their respective firms until June 25, 1886 when the executors of the last will of John Jack, assuming to act under the provisions of the fourth and fifth clauses of the will above set out, made a settlement and entered into an agreement with the defendant Wysor, whereby, in consideration that the latter agreed to pay the

In the distribution of the trust fund, partnership debts are to be ratably paid without regard to the form of the securities not constituting an actual lien held by the creditors, and this proportional equality among themselves is as necessary to be preserved as their priority over the separate creditors of the individual partners. Nicholson v. Leavitt, 4 Sandf. 300, 9 N. Y. Legal Obs. 127.

Administrator of decedent's estate.

An administrator of the estate of a decedent has nothing to do with the partnership interests, except to look after it so far as to see that no waste or fraud is committed in its management, until the surviving partner has settled up the partnership and paid all its debts, and then turned over to the administrator an equal half of what was left. Re Armstrong, 6 West. Rep. 124, 63 Mich. 355.

He cannot be made liable for negligent action of the surviving partner in closing up the business of the firm. Ibid.

He is not entitled to a participation in profits of, or to an accounting with, firms formed subsequently to his death to carry on the same business, where the new firms took the interest of deceased, believing it to have been purchased from the administrator by a third party. Demarest v. Rutan, 1 Cent. Rep. 607, 40 N. J. Eq. 356.

It is only the decedent's share of the balance to be distributed equally between the surviving partner and the representatives of the deceased partner which belongs to his representatives as part of his estate. Thomson v. Thomson, 1 Bradf. 34.

The administrator of a deceased partner has no authority to meddle with the firm assets, or to introduce into the inventory the value of his intestate's share of them; and the orphans' court should relieve him of a charge made therein of the value of such share. Shipe's App. 5 Cent. Rep. 142, 114 Pa. 205.

Only where a surviving partner fails to give bond can the administrator of the deceased partner, on giving the bond required by law, meddle with the partnership assets. Matney v. Gregg Bros. Grain Co. 1 West. Rep. 437, 19 Mo. App. 107.

Rights and remedies of surviving partners.

On the death of a partner, a dissolution of the partnership occurs, and the surviving partner becomes agent of the defunct firm for the purpose of disposing of its assets, paying its debts and settling it up; and, for this purpose, the title to such assets vests in him. First Nat. Bank v. Farmers Deposit Nat. Bank (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 505.

He must proceed to sell the personal property belonging to the firm, and account for the proceeds as trustee. He cannot himself be purchaser at his own sale, at a valuation. Scudder v. Ames, 4 West. Rep. 846, 89 Mo. 496.

He is entitled to the possession and control of the partnership assets for the purpose of winding up its affairs, with or without the statutory bond. Welse v. Moore, 5 West. Rep. 58, 22 Mo. App. 530; Farley v. Moog, 70 Ala. 148; King v. Leighton, 1 Cent. Rep. 758, 100 N. Y. 336.

A surviving partner in possession of partnership property, real or personal, has a right to hold it until firm debts to himself, as well as to others, are paid. Clay v. Freeman, 118 U. S. 97 (30 L. ed. 104).

The surviving member of an insolvent partnership may make an assignment for the equal benefit of all the creditors; but his power to mortgage the partnership effects, thereby giving the mortgagees a preference over other creditors, is a question which is worthy of consideration, and which is not decided. Espy v. Comer, 80 Ala. 333.

If he be sole surviving partner and himself in-indebtedness of the firm of Wysor & Jack, and certain debts due from the testator to Wysor, and also to pay his share of all the unpaid indebtedness of Wysor, Jack & Kline, and all other indebtedness of the testator, including the cost of administration, and, in addition, convey certain property to the widow, and secure to her one third interest in the property of Wysor, Jack & Kline free from any debts, the executors and widow agreed to convey to the defendant Wysor all the interest of the testator, excepting certain designated parcels, in the real estate owned by the firm of Wysor & Jack. This agreement was consummated and conveyances were made accordingly by the widow and executors in June, 1886; and it is charged that the defendant claims, in virtue of these conveyances, to be the sole owner of the property, and denies the title of the plaintiff.

These conveyances stood without question until in February, 1890, when this suit was instituted.

It does not appear from the complaint that there was any disparity between the value of the property conveyed and the amount of debts assumed, or that the debts have not been paid according to the agreement, or that there was any fraud or collusion between the surviving partner and the executors, or that the latter were in any way overreached.

It is claimed, however, that the power of sale contained in the will did not extend to the partnership real estate, except that specifically mentioned therein; that if it did, it only authorized the executors to sell the testator's interest in so much thereof as remained after full payment of the partnership debts. Moreover, it is claimed that even if the executors had authority to sell, the transaction as disclosed by the complaint was not a sale within the meaning of the language employed in the will, and that because the sale was made by the executors without having given notice of the time, place and terms of sale, and without having included the value of the real estate in the bond given by them when they qualified, the conveyance was invalid and void. It is claimed, too, that Wysor, being the surviving partner of the firm of Wysor & Jack, was a trustee of the partnership property, under a duty to the heirs and creditors, and that he was therefore incompetent to purchase and receive a conveyance from the executors.

For all these reasons, it is urged that the conveyance is illegal and ought to be set aside, and that an accounting of the affairs of the firm of Wysor & Jack should be had, the appellants alleging their readiness to pay whatever may be found due the defendant Wysor.

While it is undoubtedly true, as a general rule, that an action to compel a surviving partner to account can only be maintained by the personal representative of the deceased partner, yet circumstances may appear which create an exception to the general rule, and make it proper that a court of equity should entertain an action on behalf of the heirs.

Where it is shown that there is collusion between the surviving partner and the executor, the latter refusing to compel an accounting by the former, or where there have been such dealings between the two as render it probable solvent, he may assign the partnership assets for the benefit of partnership creditors, with preferences to some of them, where the local law does not forbid. Emerson v. Senter, 118 U. S. 3 (20 L. ed. 49).

His fraudulent omission from the schedules of certain partnership property, for his own benefit, does not make the assignment void where the assignee and the beneficiaries of the trust are ignorant of the fraud. Ibid.

His neglect to wind up the concern will not relieve assets from the lien of partnership debts, or permit the Statute of Limitations to run in favor of the heirs of the decedent partner, so as to enable them to obtain an interest in the property without payment of debts. Clay v. Freeman, supra.

On the death of a partner, a cause of action in a suit by the firm on a contract survives to the surviving partner, who is the only necessary party thereto. Matney v. Gregg Bros. Grain Co. 1 West. Rep. 437, 19 Mo. App. 107.

Rights as to heirs of decedent.

He can dispose of the equitable interest, and the purchaser can compel the heirs-at-law of the deceased partner to protect the purchase by a legal right. Sullivan v. Smith, 15 Neb. 435; Andrews v. Brown, 21 Ala. 443.

As between himself and the heir of the deceased partner, he has an absolute right to dispose of the real estate purchased for and used in the partnership business and paid for out of funds of the firm, in the same manner as if it were personal estate. Delmonico v. Guillaume, 2 Sandf. Ch. 366, 7 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 627; Shanks v. Klein, 104 U. S. 23 (26 L. ed. 636); Fereday v. Wightwick, 1 Russ. & M. 45; Phillips v. Phillips, 1 Mylne & K. 649; Broom v. Broom, 8 Mylne & K. 443; Cookson v. Cookson, 8 7 L. R. A.

81m. 829; Townsend v. Devaynes, referred to in 11 81m. 496.

Where articles of copartnership expressly declare that real estate purchased by the firm shall be considered as possessing all the incidents and liabilities of partnership funds and personal property, and are duly probated as part of the will of a deceased partner, the surviving partner may convey a perfect legal title to such property as against the heirs of the deceased, although he does not sell for the purpose of paying partnership debts. Davis v. Smith, 32 Ala. 198.

Surviving partner; executor of deceased partner

A surviving partner who is also the executor of his deceased partner must file in the probate court, not only a true and correct inventory of the individual property and assets of the estate, but also of the partnership property, showing who are partners, the place of business, its nature and character, the terms of the partnership, capital contributed by each and some statement of the assets and liabilities as far as known. Perrin v. Lepper, 72 Mich. —.

He must keep accurate, distinct accounts and exhibit them when called upon by the heir or his attorneys, and to all persons interested in the estate. In case of doubt as to the proper construction of the will in regard to final disposition of the estate, he must apply to the proper court, and have the matter settled, and take its direction in reference thereto. Ibid.

On his death his representative has no more right to the exclusive control of the co-partnership books, papers and property of the partnership estate than has the representative of the deceased partner. Ibid.

If he makes a statement of receipts and disbursements as survivor in winding up the business, that the executor will not make a bona fide effort to secure an accounting, or other like circumstances appear, it has been held that the heirs may maintain the action. In the absence of special circumstances, heirs have no locus standi against the surviving partner. 2 Lindley, Partn. 494; Harrison v. Righter, 11 N. J. Eq. 889; Hyer v. Burdett, 1 Edw. Ch. 325.

Assuming, without deciding, that the facts as pleaded in the present case make it apparent that the executors have placed themselves in such an attitude towards the surviving partner and the transaction sought to be set aside as to bring the case within the exception, it becomes pertinent to inquire whether or not the appellants, as heirs, show any interest in the property of the late firm of Wysor & Jack upon which to predicate an action.

If the executors had no power under the will to sell and convey, or the surviving partner was incompetent to purchase or receive a conveyance, or if, for any of the other reasons urged, the transaction between the executors and the surviving partner was illegal and the conveyance void, then the property remained in the possession and under the qualified ownership of the surviving partner, unaffected by what transpired.

It is familiar law that a surviving partner has the right to the control and possession of the property of the firm, and that he may dispose of it in order to adjust the partnership accounts, and is only liable to the representatives of the deceased partner for what remains in his hands after the partnership affairs are settled; and there is nothing more thoroughly settled in the law of partnership than that the rights of the heirs of a deceased partner are subject to the adjustment of all claims between the partners, and attach only to the surplus which remains when the partnership debts are all paid and the affairs of the firm wound up. Until all the debts are paid the rights of the heirs do not attach. Grissom v. Moore, 106 Ind. 298, and cases cited, 8 West. Rep. 657; Walling v. Burgess (Ind.) 7 L. R. A. 481; Deeter v. Sellers, 102 Ind. 458.

The heirs of a deceased partner have no interest, as such, in the property of the firm; their only remedy is to compel the surviving partner to account for the surplus after the settlement of all the partnership liabilities, and, ordinarily, a court of equity will not entertain jurisdiction of the affairs of a partnership until by its decree a final adjustment of the business can be effected. Thompson v. Lowe, 111 Ind. 272, and cases cited, 9 West. Rep. 671; Scott v. Seares, 5 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 25; Rossum v. Sinker, 12 Cent. L. J. 202, and note.

Now, while it appears that the deceased partner was indebted to the firm, and that the firm was indebted on partnership account, and that the surviving partner agreed, in consideration of the conveyance which is assailed, to pay these and other debts for which the testator's estate was liable; and while it may be inferred from the facts alleged in the complaint that the surviving partner has paid all the debts of the firm, except what remains due to himself on the partnership account,—it nowhere appears that the entire interest of the deceased showing a balance in his favor to be divided, he is insolvent, so that such balance is not substantial assets, his sureties on the executorial bond are not liable for such balance. Hooper v. Hooper, 32 W. Va. 526.

Where he wastes the social assets at a time when the partnership affairs are, or under the law should be, regarded as closed, if the survivor is insolvent his sureties on the executorial bond are not liable. Ibid.

The fact that executors have left to one of their number, who is a surviving partner of the testator, the entire management of the estate, and that he retains in the firm (without authority) the capital of the testator, will not give him the right to pledge securities of the estate for a loan to the firm. In such case the pledgee may be subrogated to whatever rights the pledgor has as cestui que trust or legatee in the securities pledged. First Nat. Bank v. Farmers Deposit Nat. Bank (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 505.

Bond required.

A bond furnished by a surviving partner is legal and is required by law. Macready v. Schenck (La.) Apr. 22, 1889 (not yet reported).

A recovery on such a bond is not limited to nominal damages, where he has failed to pay firm creditors, while having a balance of firm moneys in his hands, which he has been ordered by the court to pay them. Miller v. Kingsbury, 128 Ill. 45.

Continuance of business after death of partner.

Nothing but the clearest and most unambiguous language, demonstrating in the most positive manner, by contract or by will, the intention of the 7 L. R. A.

decedent to make his general assets liable for debts contracted in continuing trade after his death, will render his estate a partner. First Nat. Bank v. Farmers Deposit Nat. Bank (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 505.

Where, upon the death of a partner, the business is continued under the management of the survivor, with the joint funds, and such survivor purchases property and erects a factory thereon with the partnership funds, and takes the title in his own name, he and his heirs hold such legal title subject to the partnership trust. A. & W. Sprague Mfg. Co. v. Hoyt, 29 Fed. Rep. 421.

And where a corporation is formed from such partnership after the purchase of such real estate, such corporation also takes the partnership's equitable title to such property. Ibid.

A surviving partner in a cotton plantation, before the war, not authorized by partnership articles or the will of the deceased partner, could continue firm business only until the then growing crop was gathered and sold. Clay v. Field, 34 Fed. Rep. 375.

The facts that the surviving partners continued the business after the death of a partner, and the assets were conveyed to one of them, under an agreement between them, in consideration of his assuming the payment of certain mortgages upon the firm property, which was carried out; and the property turned over to such partner did not exceed in value 75 per cent of the indebtedness assumed, do not affect the rights of defendant claiming as heir-at-law of the deceased partner. Jennens v. Smith, 7 West. Rep. 323, 64 Mich. 91.

The survivor of two surgeons conducting business as copartners is not obliged to give up the business and sell the practice in the absence of any contract to that effect. Mandeville v. Harman, 5 Cent. Rep. 627, 42 N. J. Eq. 123.

partner would not be absorbed in the adjustment of the partnership account with the surviving partner. Having averred facts from which the inference arises that the surviving partner has paid all the partnership debts, and that the estate of the deceased partner is indebted to him, it is essential to the right of the heirs to call him to account that they make it appear that he has in his hands partnership property in excess of the amount required to reimburse himself. The averments in the complaint wholly fail to do this, and the conclusion is therefore unavoidable that the complainants fail to show such an interest in the property as entitles them to invoke the aid of a court of equity.

This conclusion necessarily follows from the application of the rule that a surviving partner is entitled to the custody and management of the assets, unless it be shown that he is committing waste or otherwise mismanaging the affairs of the firm, and is only liable to the heirs or representatives of the deceased partner for what remains after everything is settled up. Roy v. Vilas, 18 Wis. 109; Shanks v. Klein, 104 U. S. 18 (26 L. ed. 635), 18 Cent. L. J. 869; Anderson v. Ackerman, 88 Ind. 481; Cobble v. Tomlinson, 50 Ind. 550.

If, however, it were conceded that it appeared that the partnership assets exceeded in value the amount necessary to adjust the partnership account, it would by no means follow that the appellants could maintain this action.

It appears that more than fourteen years before the commencement of this action, the executors of the deceased partner on the one hand, acting under the authority conferred by the will, and the surviving partner on the other, consummated a final settlement and adjustment of the partnership account of Wysor & Jack.

The powers conferred by the will are broad and comprehensive, and include the power to settle, adjust and compromise all debts owing by the testator, and to make settlements with his former partners and each of them without any authority from any court, and to sell and convey, either at public or private sale, with or without appraisement, any or all of the testator's real estate, on such terms as to them should seem best, in order to pay and satisfy debts against his estate. It thus plainly appears that it was the purpose of the testator to invest his executors with power to make compromises and settlements at their discretion, and to sell and convey his real and personal estate according to their best judgment. The statute in force at the time the sale was made provided, in effect, that where lands were directed to be sold by a will, the sale, as to giving notice, conveying, taking notes and mortgages, return and confirmation, should be conducted as sales by an administrator for the payment of debts, "unless by the terms of the will different directions are given, but no petition or notice of the filing thereof shall be required." 2 Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 530.

As was in effect said in Munson v. Cole, 98 Ind. 502, the land was not directed to be sold by the will. That was left to the discretion of the executors. But if it had been, the executors were authorized to sell at their own discretion, upon such terms as they might think best; and the authority thus conferred necessarily operated as "different directions" from those prescribed by the Statute. The conveyance was not therefore invalid because the terms of the Statute were not observed or on account of any defect in the power of the executors.

This brings us to inquire whether the surviving partner occupied such a relation to the property and to those concerned as to disqualify him from purchasing the interest from the executors of the deceased partner.

It is not to be doubted that a surviving partner is regarded as a trustee primarily for the creditors of the firm, and secondarily for the heirs or personal representatives of the deceased partner in all that remains, or fairly ought to remain, after adjusting the partnership account. Accordingly, it has been correctly laid down that "the surviving partners are held strictly as trustees, and their conduct in discharging their trust is carefully looked after by the courts of equity. Thus, like other trustees, they cannot sell the property of the firm and buy it themselves; nor, as the converse of this, can they buy from themselves property for the firm. Their trust being to wind up the concern, their powers are commensurate with the trust. . . . Their trust is to wind up the concern in the best manner for all interested, and therefore without unnecessary delay." Parsons, Partn. p. 442; Case v. Abel, 1 Paige, 393; Sigourney v. Munn, 7 Conn. 11; Jones v. Dexter, 130 Mass. 380, 39 Am. Rep. 459.

Being in a sense a trustee, the surviving partner cannot, of course, speculate upon the property which the law commits to his custody, solely for his own advantage, in disregard of the interest of his cestuis que trust; and if he makes profits out of the trust property, in the course of the adjustment of the affairs of the partnership, he is held to account to those interested for their share. He cannot purchase the trust property from himself, no matter whether the attempt be made by means of a public or private sale. This is so, not only because his duty as seller and his interest as purchaser are in irreconcilable conflict, but for the more cogent reason that it is indispensable to every legal contract of sale and purchase that there be two contracting parties, competent to enter into a binding engagement with each other. Hence an attempt by a trustee who holds property in trust, whether he be surviving partner, administrator, or whatever his designation, to sell the trust estate to himself is everywhere held to be void. Martin v. Wyncoop, 12 Ind. 266; Hunsucker v. Smith, 49 Ind. 118; Murphy v. Tetr, 53 Ind. 545; Rochester v. Lecker, 104 Ind. 502, 2 West. Rep. 380; Nelson v. Layner, 66 Ill. 487.

In the case of a sale thus made or attempted, it can well be said, it is of no avail to show that the trustee acted in good faith. Such transactions are poisonous in their tendencies, and violative of the principles of public policy. They are declared void, not for the purpose of affording a remedy against actual mischief, but to prevent the possibility of wrong. Potter v. Smith, 36 Ind. 231; Morgan v. Watiles, 69 Ind. 261.

These principles do not apply or control in partner. No good reason can be suggested why a surviving partner should be held legally incompetent and absolutely disqualified from becoming the purchaser of the interest of his deceased partner in the partnership business, from his properly authorized legal representative, while very many reasons occur why such transactions, fairly entered into, should not only be upheld, but encouraged. In addition, the adjudged cases firmly support the right to make such sales. Brown v. Nis, 108 U. S. 638 [26 L. ed. 618]; Haird v. Baird, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 524, 31 Am. Dec. 390; Chambers v. Howell, 11 Beav. 8; Roy v. Vilas, supra.

In Kimball v. Lincoln, 99 Ill. 578, after reiterating the rule that a surviving partner could not become a purchaser of the firm property at his own sale, nor from a co-trustee, the court said: "But the reason that would forbid a transaction of this character has no application to a case where a surviving partner purchases property from the executor or administrator of the deceased partner, and hence the rule which would govern the one case cannot control the other." Ludlow v. Cooper, 4 Ohio St. 1.

It has thus been seen that the executors had plenary power to make settlement of the partnership account, and to sell and convey the real and personal estate of the testator at their discretion, and that the surviving partner was competent to negotiate a settlement of the affairs of the firm and to purchase the interest of his deceased partner.

It is contended, however, that the power which the will conferred upon the executors was a power to sell the real or personal estate of the testator, and that the power thus conferred was not well executed by the conveyance of the testator's interest in the real estate of the firm, in consideration of the agreement to pay debts, as already indicated. The argument is that the agreement between the executors and the surviving partner was the same in legal effect as an exchange of property, and that a power to sell does not authorize an exchange. Russell v. Russell, 36 N. Y. 581; Taylor v. Galloway, 1 Ohio, 232; Ringgold v. Ringgold, 1 Harr. & G. 11; King v. Whiton, 16 Wis. 684; Cleveland v. State Bank, 16 Ohio St. 286.

Conceding that the proposition above stated is correct as a general rule, it cannot be made available in the appellant's behalf for two reasons:

(1) The power conferred upon the executors comprehended much more than a mere naked authority to sell and convey the testator's real estate. They were especially invested with power to make settlement with the partners of the testator, and with each of them, of all matters pertaining to the partnership business, and to adjust, settle and compromise all debts, claims or demands against the estate of the testator, according to their best judgment; and, in addition to the foregoing power, they were authorized, at their discretion, to sell and manage, as personally, and the power conferred by the fourth clause of the will to make a settlement of the partnership affairs invested the executors with ample authority, in case it became expedient or necessary in the course of the settlement to transfer property to the surviving partner, to make such transfer. Ludlow v. Cooper, supra.

Moreover, the power contained in the fifth clause must be construed in connection with the duties imposed upon the executors by the fourth clause of the will. It will be observed that the executors are directed to sell and convey so much of the testator's real estate as they shall deem necessary to pay and satisfy his debts. Construing both clauses of the will together, it becomes apparent that the executors had authority to make any proper settlement which, in their discretion, seemed fit and best.

(2) A settlement and final accounting with the surviving partner of the partnership matters having been actually consummated by the executors who were duly empowered to that end, a court of equity will not disturb the settlement so made until it is impeached as fraudulent or unfair, or unless collusion between the executors and surviving partner is shown. Nothing less than fraud or collusion will invalidate an arrangement between an executor and a surviving partner, whereby the latter became the purchaser of the deceased partner's share. Travis v. Mills, 9 Haro. 141; Davies v. Davies, 2 Keen, 684; Chambers v. Howell, supra; Stainton v. Carron Co. 18 Beav. 146; Smith v. Everett, 27 Beav. 446; 2 Lindley, Parto. Rapalje's ed. 487.

As has been seen, there is no pretense of any fraud or collusion in the present case.

Finally, after the settlement and accounting between the executors and the surviving partner has been had, and the account closed, as appears to have been the fact in the present case, a court of equity will not, after this long acquiescence, unexplained by circumstances, decree the opening up of the account, even though it appeared that the settlement had been irregularly made.

It is the settled doctrine of courts of equity that unexplained delay in the prosecution of a right until it becomes stale constitutes such laches as forbids the interference of the court. Smith v. Thomson, 7 Gratt. 112, 54 Am. Dec. 126, and note; Hough v. Oughlan, 41 Ill. 181; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1620.

Here, as we have seen, there is an unexplained delay of fourteen years. The Statute of Limitations would have barred an action between the partners themselves in case the settlements had been made by them. After this lapse of time a presumption of innocence and fair dealing arises, and removes every inference or imputation of bad faith from the transaction, and the settlement must repose as the parties made it. Prevost v. Gratz, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 481 (5 L. ed. 211); Rochester v. Lansing, 104 Ind. 562, 2 West. Rep. 330.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

A. S. NEWSON, Appt.,
v.
CITY OF GALVESTON et al.
(....Tex....)

- 1. A city has power to forbid the selling of fresh meats elsewhere than at market houses established by it, where its charter empowers it to establish market houses, designate, control and regulate market places, and regulate the vending of fresh meats.
- 2. Licensing a person to keep a private meat market for several years does not compel the city to continue granting such a license, or to prohibit keeping a market within the district where it is situated.
- 3. A person is not deprived of his property without due process of law by an ordinance forbidding private markets within certain limits, in which he has established a market under license from the city and expended money thereon.
- 4. Denying the privilege to sell meats in a city except at certain places is not void as in restraint of trade.

(March 12, 1890.)

APP<sup>EAL</sup> by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Galveston County dismissing his bill filed to enjoin interference by the city authorities with a private market owned and kept by him for the sale of fresh meats. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Quitman Finlay, John Lovejoy and A. Sampson, for appellant:

The ordinance fixing the boundaries within which no private market shall be established, and fixing the rental of stalls in the public market, and prescribing a penalty for its violation, is in restraint of trade, unreasonable, tyrannical, oppressive and void.

St. Paul v. Laidler, 2 Minn. 190, 72 Am. Dec. 99, and note; Slaughter House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 86 (21 L. ed. 894), (Judge Field's dissenting opinion, divided court); Bethune v. Hughes, 28 Ga. 560, 78 Am. Dec. 799; Caldwell v. Alton, 88 Ill. 410, 75 Am. Dec. 282.

The ordinance amounts to the damaging and destroying of petitioner's property without compensation, and is void.

State Const. Bill of Rights, § 17; U. S. Const. 14th Amend.

It amounts to the depriving of petitioner of property without due process of law, and is

Under its charter the City of Galveston had the power to fix the times and places at which fresh meats might be sold within its corporate limits, and to prohibit their sale at other times and places; and the ordinances prohibiting the establishment and conduct of private markets for such purposes within the limits therein prescribed were a proper exercise of that power.

Buffalo v. Webster, 10 Wend. 100; Bush v. Senbury, 8 Johns. 418; New Orleans v. Stafford, 27 La. Ann. 417; Wartman v. Philadelphia, 33 Pa. 202; Ash v. Poole, 11 Mich. 347; 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. §§ 880, 884; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 811-813; St. Louis v. Weber, 44 Mo. 547; Winnabow v. Smart, 11 Rich. L. 551.

The exercise of this power by the City is in the nature of a police regulation, and does not violate private rights or improperly restrain trade.

Re Nightingale, 11 Pick. 108; New Orleans v. Stafford, 27 La. Ann. 417; Wartman v. Philadelphia, 33 Pa. 202; 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 826.

Green-grocers and vendors of fresh meats, fish, poultry, etc., have always been held to be proper subjects for the exercise of the police powers of a State or city.

1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 334; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 812-814.

Forbidding, by ordinance, the establishment or conduct of private markets for the sale of fresh meats, within certain limits, and punishing by fine any violation thereof, was not a taking by the City of the plaintiff's property, but was simply a legitimate regulation of the use and enjoyment of that property by him, under the police powers delegated to the City by the State.

1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 141; New Orleans v. Stafford, 27 La. Ann. 417; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 813; Louisville O. R. Co. v. Louisville; 8 Bush, 416.

Whatever right to establish and conduct or maintain a private market the plaintiff may have acquired from the City in 1884, that right was necessarily subordinate to the City's right at all times to the exercise of its police powers over such occupation.

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 887; 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 884.

Stayton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit for injunction, instituted in the District Court of Galveston County, Jan-larly called for trial on its merits, the bill was dismissed; to which rulings the plaintiff excepted, and gave notice of appeal. The facts bearing on the controversy, necessary to be stated, are thus correctly given in condensed form by counsel for appellants, from the pleadings:

"By its charter, the City of Galveston is authorized and empowered to establish and erect markets and market houses; designate, control and regulate market-places and privileges, inspect and determine the mode of inspecting meat, fish, vegetables and all produce, and every article and thing brought therein for sale, to license, tax and regulate merchants and all other trades and professions, occupations and callings, the taxing of which is not prohibited by the Constitution of the State, to regulate the inspection and vending of fresh meats, poultry, fish, vegetables, fruits, butter, lard and other provisions, and the place and manner of selling fish and inspecting the same, to make such rules and regulations in relation to butchers as the city council may deem necessary and proper; and to pass all ordinances, rules and police regulations, not contrary to the Constitution of this State, for the good government, peace and order of the City, and the trade and commerce thereof, that may be necessary or proper to carry into effect the powers vested by its charter in the said corporation, the city government or any department thereof; and to enforce the observance of all such rules, ordinances or police regulations, and punish violations thereof by fines, penalties and imprisonment,—fines being limited to $200, and imprisonment to three months. In pursuance of these powers, the city council, in 1880, passed an ordinance authorizing the establishment of private markets for the sale of fresh meats within the corporate limits, upon written application to the city council for that privilege, stating the length of time and the place where such market was to be established, the time for such privilege not to be less than three nor more than twelve months; and, if granted, in whole or in part each and every person occupying such market to pay for the privilege quarterly, in advance, at the rate of $50 per annum, and all private markets to be governed by and stand under the ordinances, rules and regulations of the said City, and imposing a fine or penalty of not less than $10 nor more than $50 for each day's violation of any of the provisions of said ordinance. In October, 1887, the city council amended this ordinance by providing that all market privileges theretofore granted should terminate on the 1st day of January, 1888, and all market privileges thereafter granted should terminate on the 1st day of the next succeeding January. June 28, 1888, the city council digested all ordinances of the City of a general nature, and continued in full force and effect the ordinance of 1880, as amended in October, 1887.

"On October 2, 1888, the city council adopted an ordinance amendatory of the Revised Ordinances of the City adopted June 18, 1888, providing that from and after January 1, 1889, no private market should be established in the city, by or for any person, within the limits of the City, and between Avenue K on the south, and the channel of Galveston Bay on the north; and by the ordinances of the City any person violating the provisions of this ordinance is subject to a fine of $10.

"On February 18, 1880, the city council again amended the Revised Ordinances by the passage of the following: 'Hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person to establish, operate or maintain any private market for the sale of butchers' meats within the following boundaries in the City, to wit: between Thirteenth Street on the east and Twenty-Seventh Street on the west, and between Avenue K on the south and the channel of the bay on the north. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this article shall, on conviction, be fined $10, and each and every day any such violation shall occur shall constitute a separate offense.'

"In October, 1884, the plaintiff, A. B. Newson, made application in writing to the city council for permission to establish, under the Ordinance of 1880, which was then in force, a private market, in the City of Galveston, for the sale of fresh meats. This application was granted by the council, and immediately thereafter the plaintiff established, on Twenty-First Street, between Market and Mechanic Streets, in said City, a private market for the sale of fresh meats, fitting up the same with refrigerator and other appliances at an expense to himself of several thousand dollars, and continued, unmolested, to conduct such market, at a profit, from that time until January 1, 1889, paying to the proper officer of the City, quarterly in advance, the tax imposed by that ordinance for the exercise of such privilege. This private market of the plaintiff is located within the limits in which such markets are prohibited by the provisions of the Ordinances of October 2, 1880, and February 18, 1880.

"Prior to January 1, 1889, the City had erected and completed, within the limits defined by the Ordinance of October 2, 1880, a large and commodious market house, for the accommodation of the public and those engaged in vending fresh meats, etc., and containing stalls to let for such purposes at a reasonable rental fixed by the city council. No privilege to establish or conduct a private market in the city limits had been granted to the plaintiff since January 1, 1884, and the last granted to him expired December 31, 1888. In January, 1889, he tendered, for the quarter commencing the first of that month, to the city official whose duty it is to collect taxes and fees for licenses, the amount imposed, under the Ordinance of 1880, for the privilege of conducting a private market within the City, but the officer declined to receive the same, and refused to issue him further license in that behalf; and the plaintiff was then notified to desist, under penalty of the law, from further conducting his said market for the sale of fresh meats at the said locality on Twenty-First Street, within the said prescribed limits. Notwithstanding, however, the change in the law, and the refusal of the City to further grant him the privilege of conducting his said market, the plaintiff continued the same, and was in January, 1889, arrested under a warrant violation of the ordinances prohibiting the establishment of private markets for the sale of fresh meats within the limits in said City prescribed by the aforementioned ordinances. The plaintiff was at the time a renter of stalls in the said market-house erected by the City, and vended meats therein, as well as at his private market. The prosecution in the recorder's court was pending at the time of the filing of the bill and the service of the writ of injunction in this case. The bill charges that the plaintiff's private market having been established at an expenditure of his moneys in October, 1884, under permission from the city council, his right to conduct the same, unmolested, had become vested, and the City was without authority to interfere with him in its exercise; and the ordinances passed subsequently in October, 1884, prohibiting the establishment or conduct of private markets within the limits therein defined, are null and void, in so far as they affect that right; that the said ordinances are in restraint of trade; that the enforcement of them would be to deprive the plaintiff of his property without due process of law; and also other matters,—all of which are specifically denied in the defendants' answer."

Under the provisions of the charter empowering the City to establish market-houses, designate, control and regulate market places, and to regulate the vending of fresh meats, poultry, fish and other things, no doubt can exist of the power of the City to establish market-houses, and to require fresh meats to be sold there, and also to forbid their sale at other places. Such a power is most necessary for the protection of the health of a city, and has often been recognized under charters not so clearly conferring it as does the charter of the City of Galveston. Buffalo v. Webster, 10 Wend. 100; Bush v. Seabury, 8 Johns. 418; Winnsboro v. Smart, 11 Rich. L. 552; Bowling Green v. Carson, 10 Bush. 65; New Orleans v. Stafford, 27 La. Ann. 417; St. Louis v. Weber, 44 Mo. 540; Wartman v. Philadelphia, 88 Pa. 209; Ash v.

The case of Le Claire v. Davenport, 13 Iowa, 210, goes much further, in that it protected a private individual in the exclusive privilege to furnish a market-place.

Palestine v. Barnes, 50 Tex. 538, seems to have recognized the power of a municipal corporation to confer like exclusive market privileges. We refer to the last two cases cited for illustrations of the rulings on the general question before us, but are not called upon, by the facts of this case, to adopt or reject them on the question of power to confer such exclusive privileges. The character of power the City exercised in authorizing meats to be sold in private markets was not such as the City could be prevented from exercising again by withdrawing the privilege whenever the public good required it. The police power possessed by such corporations cannot be fettered by contracts, but must be left free to be exercised at all times, whether in conferring or withdrawing privileges once conferred. If license tax had been paid for a year, this would not deprive the City of the power to withdraw the privilege before its expiration, if the public welfare demanded it. Much less would the fact that the City for a time had received the tax, and granted the privilege, make it incumbent on it to continue to do so. If appellant expended money in preparing his private market place for the conduct of his business, he did so with full knowledge that the City might at any time forbid the business to be there conducted. The City has neither divested him of a right nor deprived him of his property, nor are the ordinances complained of unlawful because in restraint of trade. He is not denied the right to sell meats, but is denied the right to sell at a particular place. This is but that regulation of his right which the charter of the City authorized it to make, and it must be presumed that the city council in its action was prompted solely by a desire to promote the public welfare.

There is no error in the judgment, and it will be affirmed.

(January 2, 1880.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action for a divorce. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Morris Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, with Mr. George E. Neuman, for appellant; assumed marriage rights, duties and obligations (Cum. v. Hurley, 14 Gray, 411, 413; have been generally (Kenne v. Purcell, 23 Md. 607, 607; Cunningham v. Cunningham, 2 Dow, P. C. 481, 511; Yardley's Estate, 76 Pa. 207, 212; Radger v. Burdger 61 N. Y. 566) reputed in the place of their residence to be husband and wife (The Breadalbane Case, L. R. 1 H. L. 182, 183, 190; Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 523; Green v. State, 60 Ala. 68, 70; Burlington v. Munson, 33 Conn. 481, 487; Dowers v. Van Winkle, 41 Ind. 422, 425; Miller v. White, 57 Ill. 680, 685; Proctor v. Higelow, 30 Mich. 322, 323; Redgrave v. Redgrave, 28 Md. 88, 97; Henderson v. Cargill, 31 Miss. 387, 408, 409; Richard v. Graham, 73 Pa. 140, 144). —are relevant to prove a contract of marriage between them (DeThuren v. Atty-Gen. L. R. 1 App. Cas. 699, 711; Campbell v. Campbell, L. R. 1 H. L. 50, 132, 300; Langtry v. State, 30 Ala. 536, 537. See State v. Wilson, 22 Iowa, 304, 305; Richard v. Graham, supra; and consequently, in cases where no celebration is necessary, are sufficient to prove a valid marriage. Langtry v. State and State v. Wilson, supra; Com v. Jackson, 11 Bush, 679, 686; Blaini v. Blaini 30 La. Ann. 1388, 1397; Cayford's Case, 7 Me. 57, 58; Henderson v. Cargill, 31 Miss. 387; Davis v. Davis, 1 Abb. N. C. 140, 142; Forney v. Hallauber, 3 Berg. & R. 160, 161; State v. Hilton, 3 Rich. L. 484, 485.

But in cases where a celebration is necessary, evidence of a contract only is not relevant to prove and Div. § 262; Brinkley v. Brinkley, 50 N. Y. 184, 193; Collins v. Collins, 80 N. Y. 1, 5; Emerson v. Shaw, 56 N. H. 420.

While cohabitation and matrimonial reputation are facts from which a prior marriage may sometimes be presumed, both must concur, to be even prima facie evidence of marriage. Neither is, alone, evidence of marriage.

1 Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 438, 1 Greenl. Ev. § 107, and cases cited; Cargile v. Wood, 63 Mo. 501, Foster v. Hawley, 8 Hun, 69, Smyth's Estate (Pa.) 1 Leg. Gaz. Rep. 210; Guardians of the Poor v. Nathans, 2 Brewst. 149, 3 Pa. L. J. Rep. (Clark) 130, Becking's App. 2 Brewst. 202, 1 Phill. Ev. 234, 225; Hervey v. Hervey, 9 W. Bl. 577; Birt v. Harlow, 1 Doug. 171, 174; Reel v. Pinner, 1 Esp. 213, Leader v. Barry, 1 Esp. 253; Doe v. Fleming, 4 Bing. 266; Smith v. Hason, 1 Phillim. 294; Hammick v. Branson, 5 Day, 290, 291; Ross v. (Clark, 3 Paige, 574; Ford v. Forst, 4 Ala. 142, Jenkins v. Inabee, 1 Edw. Ch. 577; Whitehead v. Cinch, 2 Hayw. (N. C.) 8; Kuhl v. Knauer, 7 B. Mon. 180, Com. v. Stump, 53 Pa. 183.

To raise the presumption of marriage from cohabitation and reputation, the reputation must not be divided and the cohabitation must be matrimonial in its inception.

Clayton v. Wardell, 4 N. Y. 230, 235; Barnum v. Barnum, 42 Md. 251; Cunningham v. Cunningham, 2 Dow, P. C. 482; 1 Fraser, Dom. Rel. 207; Jones v. Hunter, 3 La. Ann. 254; Hamilton v. Hamilton, 1 Bell, App. Cas. 736, 9 Clark & F. 327.

Evidence of cohabitation and reputation should be resorted to, to prove a prior actual contract of marriage; only when, by lapse of time, or death of the parties, or other sufficient reason, it has become impossible to obtain direct proof of such actual marriage.

Clayton v. Wardell, 4 N. Y. 230, 240; Bishop, the celebration; still, if the parties have cohabited, such evidence may be, in certain cases, deemed relevant (George v. Thomas, 10 U. C. Q. B. 806, 808; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, supra), on the presumption that such cohabitation was lawful. Cargile v. Wood, 63 Mo. 501, 511; Case v. Case, 17 Cal. 598, 600.

Cohabitation and repute may thus be direct evidence of a valid marriage (Guardians of Poor v. Nathans, 2 Brewst. 149, 152; Donnelly v. Donnelly, 5 D. Mon. 112, 117), or indirect (The Breadalbane Case, L. R. 1 H. L. 182, 183, 190; Cunningham v. Cunningham, 2 Dow, P. C. 482, 511; Breaker v. Breaker, 3 U. C. Q. B. 810; Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Abb. (U. Mr. T. L. Bergin for respondent.

Thornton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for a divorce on the ground of adultery, brought by Jane White, against the defendant, E. White. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and defendant appealed from the judgment and verdict. Defendant denied that he was ever married to the plaintiff. He claims that their relationship was that of a man and mistress. On this issue the court found in favor of the plaintiff. The plaintiff, Jane White, was born in this State in the month of May, 1850, then a young widow of twenty years of age, with an infant of the month of July, 1850, the defendant, E. White, of the City of San Francisco, engaged her to act as housekeeper for him on Geronimo, situate in the County of San Francisco, for a compensation of $100 per month. The plaintiff, Jane White, in place of defendant, the San Francisco, to act as housekeeper, and defendant, E. White, as housekeeper for defendant. S and the fact of their mutual ignorance to contract forbids any presumption that a new contract was made. Rice v. Rice, 1 Eng. Rep. 406, 141 Mass. 385.

Cohabitation and repute do not constitute marriage; they are only evidence tending to create a presumption of marriage. Cartwright v. McGown, 10 West. Rep. 589, 121 Ill. 388; Waddingham, 4 West. Rep. 834, 21 Mo. A.

Sexual intercourse which the parties are contrary to law cannot form even a presumption of marriage. Cartwright v. McGown, 10 West. Rep. 589, 121 Ill. 388.

Without proof of subsequent act, it will not be presumed, from cohabitation and reputation, that a relationship beginning has been changed to that of marriage. Reading F. Ins. & T. Co.

on the facts, defendant had illicit intercourse with plaintiff, and thereafter, in the year 1851, a child was born, the fruit of such intercourse. About the year 1853 another child was born to the parties. Between the birth of the first child and the birth of the second, the plaintiff and defendant mutually agreed to marry, and did marry, each other, and did thereafter live and cohabit together as husband and wife, and continued to do so from that time continuously up to a short time before this action was begun. The marriage of the parties was not performed by any clergyman or minister of the law, but was ascertained to and agreed upon and entered into by and between the parties themselves, and from that time to the commencement of this action the parties have ever treated and held each other out to the community, their friends and acquaintances, as husband and wife, and they have always been accepted, received and treated as such by their friends and acquaintances and the community. Other children than those mentioned were born to the parties. At the time this suit was begun there were two children living, the fruits of the intercourse between the parties. One of these was a daughter, named Nellie, born in March, 1858, and the other a son, named William, born in January, 1859.

In regard to the issue of the marriage, it is clear that there was never any promise to marry made between the parties either by present words (per verba de presenti) or by words in the future (per verba de futuro). But it is urged on behalf of plaintiff that the evidence shows cohabitation and repute sufficient to establish a marriage. Such seems to have been the view of the case taken by the court below. That a marriage may be inferred from cohabitation seems to be the settled law of most countries. The law of Scotland is set forth, and the cases on this subject are collected and commented on, by a learned and distinguished writer, Patrick Fraser, LL. D., in his able work on the Law of Scotland regarding the relation of husband and wife. See chapter 8 of Fraser's "Husband and Wife," the work above referred to.

The law is thus stated in the initial sentence of the chapter just referred to: "If a man and a woman cohabit together as husband and wife, and are held and reputed by their neighbors and friends as married persons, they are presumed to have entered into marriage." The learned author adds to the above, by way of explanation, that "cohabitation and repute do not make marriage. They are merely items of evidence from which it may be inferred that a marriage had been entered into."

The facts in evidence must be such as to justify the inference that matrimonial consent had been interchanged between the parties, for the matrimonial contract is formed by consent, not consent alone. See 1 Fraser, Husband and Wife, 804.

Lord Cranworth, in his judgment in the case of Campbell v. Campbell (a Scotch appeal case) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 200, 201, thus expresses himself on this subject: "Marriage can only exist as the result of mutual agreement. The conduct of the parties and of their friends and neighbors, in other words habits and repute, 7 L. R. A.

to the laws of marriage were existing, unsatisfactory evidence that at some unspecified time a mutual agreement to marry was entered into by the parties passing as man and wife. I cannot, however, think it correct to say that habits and repute in any case make the marriage; . . . but I prefer to say that habits and repute afford, by the law of Scotland, as, indeed, of all countries, evidence of marriage always strong, and in Scotland, unless met by counter evidence, generally conclusive." Lord Westbury observes, in the same case, as follows: "Exception may possibly be taken to some few words occurring in one of the judgments [referring to a judgment in the court below] which represents cohabitation with habits and repute as a mode of contracting marriage. Perhaps it may not be strictly correct to say that it is a mode of contracting marriage. It is rather a mode of making manifest to the world that tacit consent which the law will infer to have been already interchanged. If I were to express what I collect from the different opinions on the subject, I should rather be inclined to express the rule in the following language: That cohabitation as husband and wife is a manifestation of the parties having consented to contract that relation inter se. It is a holding forth to the world, by the manner of daily life, by conduct, demeanor and habit, that the man and woman who live together have agreed to take each other in marriage, and to stand in the mutual relation of husband and wife; and when credit is given by those among whom they live, by their relatives, neighbors, friends and acquaintances, to these representations and this continued conduct, then habits and repute arise, and attend upon the cohabitation. The parties are held and reported to be husband and wife; and the law of Scotland accepts this combination of circumstances as evidence that consent to marry has been lawfully interchanged. Probably, therefore, in the correct expression of the law, it would be more proper to say that cohabitation, with habits and repute, is a mode of proving the fact of marriage, rather than a mode of contracting marriage." Id. 211. To the same effect is the opinion of Lord Moncrieff in Lapsley v. Grierson, 8 Cl. Sem. Cas. (2d Series) (Dunlop, B. & M.) 61, and in Laurie v. Mercer, 8 Cl. Sem. Cas. (2d Series) (Dunlop, B. & M.) 966.

The same rule is recognized by the law of England. See Goodman v. Goodman, 38 L. J. N. S. Ch. 745; Plunkett v. Sharpe, 1 Lee, Ecl. 441; Bond v. Bond, 3 Lee, Ecl. 45; Diddear v. Fawcett, 3 Phillim. Ecl. 580; Hervey v. Hervey, 3 W. Bl. 877. See Starkie, Ev. 41b ed 45, where the doctrine is explained.

The observations of Starkie are quoted in 1 Fraser, Husband and Wife, 807. See also remarks of Lord Cranworth in Campbell v. Campbell, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 199, 200. Fraser states that the rule is acknowledged to a limited extent in Code Civil of France, in relation to the legitimacy of children. Fraser, Husband and Wife, 807, 808.

The proof of marriage by cohabitation and repute has been recognized in many cases in the United States, as in Fenton v. Root, 4 Johns. 52; Clayton v. Wardell, 4 N. Y. 230; Jones v. Hunter, 3 La. Ann. 264; Darvum v. Darvum, v. Hawley, 8 Hun, 68; Dickings's App. Brown, 203; Purcell v. Purcell, 4 Hen. & M. 512; Brinkley v. Brinkley, 60 N. Y. 197, 198; Hynes v. McDermott, 10 Daly, 428, 82 N. Y. 46, 81 N. Y. 451; Stadger v. Stadger, 88 N. Y. 554; Van Tuyl v. Van Tuyl, 57 Barb. 237; Ross v. Clark, 8 Paige, 580-582.

That a marriage in this State may be established per verba in presenti, or by a contract per verba de futuro, cum subsequente copula, was recognized in State of McQuand, 52 Cal. 577. The contract characterized as entered into per verba de futuro is only evidence of marriage as proving the requisite matrimonial consent. Such consent is essential to every marriage (1 Fraser, Hunb. and W. 415); and, prior to the adoption of the Civil Code in this State, consent alone constituted marriage. The law at that time was correctly expressed by the Latin words, "consensus non concubitus facit nuptias." As cohabitation and repute are only a mode of proving the required consent, and thus establishing marriage, there is no reason why the rules above stated regarding cohabitation and repute did not obtain in this State during the greater part of the period of the cohabitation of the parties to this action.

The evidence in this case plainly shows, and it is so found, that the intercourse between the parties was in its beginning illicit and meretricious, and it is contended (1) that it is presumed to continue illicit and meretricious until such presumption is overcome by distinct proof of marriage; and (2) that mere continued cohabitation and reputation of marriage create no presumption of a subsequent marriage in such case. With regard to this contention, we think it may be considered as sound and settled law that as regards the cohabitation of a man and woman, not shown to have been in its origin illicit, the presumption is that it is lawful. Per Lord Eldon in Cunningham v. Cunningham, 2 Dow, P. C. 482; per Lord Redesdale in

Marble v. Mar

The law always presumes, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the conduct of men is lawful, and in accordance with the rules of morality. Lapsley v. Grierson, 1 H. L. Cas. 498.

But when the intercourse was illicit from the beginning, in the absence of evidence from which a change to the matrimonial relation may be inferred, it is presumed to continue. The state of illicit intercourse is presumed to continue until the evidence shows that the intercourse of the parties has become matrimonial.

The above, we think, is the meaning and extent of the decision in the case of Cunningham v. Cunningham (known as the "Balbougie Case"), above cited. No greater change than that shown

In each of these cases the whole lives and conduct of the parties to see if they did not prove a habit and repute, and it was held in the repute was not general and singular and divided.

The opinions in the cases above were examined in Campbell v. Campbell, as the "Breadalbans Case" (L. 182, and the language of the court explained; and the conclusion was that, though the connection beginning illicit, yet the subsequent the parties might be such as to prove, by habit and repute, that a status had been assumed. The lords discussed the question, and the conclusion above stated.

In the Breadalbans Case arose as to the legitimacy of Campbell, who eloped with Ludlow in 1780 or 1781. Ludlow Up to that time no marriage existed. The court held that the evidence after that time, and during the Campbell, the habit and repute formed and undivided, and established marriage between Campbell and the Ludlow.

The change must be such as to take out. This must be so when the origin is illicit, and there is no change to the marriage. There was no change in the Balbougie Case. In that case, as in the Breadalbans Case, the illicit cohabitation. Surely the change from mere illicit cohabitation to marriage cannot be said to be a change from illicit cohabitation to marriage. There must be a change operation which the law regards as a change may be operated by a change in reputation.

In the case of Lapsley v. Grierson, the Breadalbans Case, where the marriage began, one of the parties, the husband living. In the Breadalbans Case marriage was not contended for time of Ludlow, the husband. I and the parties continued to cohabit until the death of James Ludlow, 1806, and during this period from Ludlow, to the death of Campbell, undoubtedly from 1793 to 1806, the Marie Blanchard, was received as his wife by his family and friends and acquaintances. There was evidence in the Breadalbans Case tending to show that there had been a formal marriage ceremony in 1793, and some evidence that as "madam." Could not swear that he had heard White call her "wife" or "Mrs. White" in speaking to or of her.

The next witness was Mrs. Smith, the wife of the former witness. She met the plaintiff about twenty years ago (his testimony was given on the trial, in December, 1881), and Mr. White about twenty-two or twenty-three years ago. She met them at Albion, in Mendocino County. She lived near them. Knew the children Nellie and Willie. Sometimes she had seen plaintiff and defendant half a dozen times a day,—sometimes more; sometimes less. So far as she knew, they were known at Albion as Mr and Mrs. White. She had heard the defendant call the plaintiff "the madam," "my wife" and "Jane." She was not very sure of any particular instance when she heard defendant call plaintiff his wife. She was very positive she had heard White call plaintiff his wife, and more than once, and this in address to her.

The next witness is Mrs. Helen M. Kimball, who was the sister of defendant. Has known the plaintiff since 1868. Became acquainted with her at her brother's (White's) house, in Albion, when he was keeping the hotel there. She was introduced to her. Can not tell how she was introduced to her. Was introduced by her brother. He usually addressed her as "Jane," and in speaking of her he called her "Madam;" and, in speaking to the children, "your mother." She does not remember that her brother introduced plaintiff to her as his wife. Does not remember that he told her she was his wife. Her understanding was that she supposed she (plaintiff) was his wife. They lived as husband and wife. She and her father and mother lived in the house with them eight months. She testifies further that plaintiff was received and treated by her father and mother (father and mother of defendant also) and their relatives as the wife of defendant. She does not remember hearing her brother speak of plaintiff as Mrs. White. She thought it a little peculiar that he addressed her as "Jane" or "Madam." She does not know that she spoke of it while living at the hotel. While they lived there they regarded her as White's wife.

Mrs. W. L. Jenny testified that she had known the parties nineteen or twenty years. She was introduced to plaintiff by a lady named Cunningham. Mr. White was not present. White never introduced plaintiff to her. He always called her "the madam." Knew the children. They went by the names of Nellie White and Willie White. She had not been to their home for twenty years. Before that used to call there once in a while. Have taken dinner there a good many times. Mr. White was present. The witness was a married woman. She always thought the parties acted towards each other as husband and wife. She never heard him call her "wife." The children addressed Mr. White and the plaintiff as their father and mother.

George W. Le Mont had known the parties some ten or twelve or fourteen years. Had frequently taken lunch at White's house. He appeared like a family living in harmony. Miss Annie Manning had known the parties about four years. She thinks they acted towards each other as husband and wife. They acted towards their children as a father and mother should.

Jerome B. Ford became acquainted with defendant at Albion some time between 1865 and 1868. Was at the hotel in Albion frequently. Had never been introduced to Mrs. White, and never spoke to her. They were said to be then Mr. and Mrs. White,—L. E. White and wife. Had known the parties four years next March. Mr. White used to speak to plaintiff as any man would to his wife. Could not say what name he called her.

B. H. Madison testified that he had known Mr. White ten or twelve years. Had visited the house several times on business, and thinks he once made a social call with his wife and eldest daughter. Both White and plaintiff were present. He called her Mrs. White in the presence of defendant, and of his wife and family.

James Brett had heard defendant speak of plaintiff as his wife. His (witness's) wife addressed plaintiff in presence of defendant as his wife.

James Kenny had known the parties for twenty-five or twenty-six years. Had known them at Cuffey's Cove. He believed they had lived on a ranch there for five or six years as Mr. and Mrs. White. He was on friendly and social terms with them during their residence at Cuffey's Cove. The reputation of their relation while they resided there was that of man and wife, so far as he ever heard. He first called at defendant's house. Then Mr. White introduced her; "but not sure defendant was accustomed to speak to me and to others in my presence of plaintiff as Mrs. White. If I remember right, defendant introduced me to plaintiff as his wife;" but he has no distinct recollection of the introducing. While the parties lived at Cuffey's Cove, heard a rumor that they were not married.

Engene Brown had known defendant a little over twenty years, the plaintiff a little less, while they resided in Mendocino County. He knew the reputation in the community in which the parties lived of the relation they bore to each other since he first knew them, and up to the time he gave his testimony. The reputation was that they lived together as married people in Mendocino County, and had never heard anything to the contrary until this divorce case came up. He did not think he had contradicted his impression of the facts with public reputation thereof. Heard her called his wife once or twice in Mendocino County. Had heard her called Mrs. White frequently, but does not distinctly remember of hearing her called Mrs. White at The Albion. He could not remember who of the people at The Albion he had heard say that plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife.

Mark D. Gray testified that he saw plaintiff at The Albion once in 1877. Defendant introduced plaintiff as "the madam."

There is evidence here, at least since 1861, of cohabitation and repute which tends to show a marriage between the parties. Such cohabitation and repute "is a mode," as said by Lord Westbury in Campbell v. Campbell, supra, "of making manifest to the world that tacit consent which the law will infer to have been already interchanged." L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 211.

The repute, which was nearly all one way prior to 1858, afterwards underwent a change. We think the evidence tends to show that the parties had agreed to stand in the relation of husband and wife. The defendant treated the plaintiff as his wife. If he did not in so many words formally introduce the plaintiff to his father and mother and sister as his wife, his conduct convinced them that she was his wife; and, according to the testimony of the sister (Mrs. Kimball), she and the father and mother of defendant received plaintiff and treated her as defendant's wife. They did not go much into society, but in the contracted circle into which they went they were regarded and treated as husband and wife. This treatment was induced by the conduct of defendant and plaintiff. We do not think that the law requires the formal introduction by the husband of the woman as his wife to each member of the social circle into which they go, but that his conduct should justify her reception in such circle as his wife. The defendant's styling the plaintiff "the madam," might well induce persons to whom he so introduced her, or to whom he thus spoke of her, to believe that she was his wife. He admits that he did introduce her as his wife, and this is evidence that he sometimes spoke of her as his wife. He explains the introduction of her as his wife as a mode of shielding his children, but such mental reservation cannot be considered of much weight. The credit to be given to such reservation, and the weight and value of the testimony, are matters for the consideration and determination of the court below. That tribunal weighed the testimony, and found a marriage; and there is not such a lack of testimony here as will authorize this court to say that the evidence was insufficient to justify the conclusion of the trial court.

But it is urged that, inasmuch as the divorce is sought here on the ground of adultery, that a marriage cannot be proved by cohabitation and repute; and, to sustain this, two cases are referred to, decided in this court: Joss v. Case, 17 Cal. 600, and People v. Anderson, 26 Cal. 183. In the latter case, which was an indictment for murder, a witness was called for the people, whose competency was challenged by the defendant on the ground that she was his wife, and an attempt was made to show that such was the relation of the witness to the defendant by cohabitation and repute. The court, per Sanderson, Ch. J., said that the general rule is that such evidence was admissible (citing several authorities to sustain this proposition), and then adds: "Actions of crim. con., divorce, indictments for bigamy and like cases, where the marriage is the foundation of the claim to be enforced, or the crime to be punished, are exceptions to this rule." 26 Cal. 184. Case v. Case was an action for divorce on the ground of adultery. The only evidence of marriage between the parties to the action was that of cohabitation and reputation. It appeared that defendant had, after this cohabitation, married another person. The evidence of cohabitation and reputation was objected to, and this court held it inadmissible. The court, per Cope, J., said: "We think that, under the circumstances, an actual marriage should have been proved. The general rule that in actions of this nature the marriage may be inferred from the cohabitation of the parties, we do not understand to be applicable. We cannot indulge this inference without presuming that the defendant has been guilty of the crime of bigamy; and the fact that it involves such a presumption is sufficient to repel it. In the absence of criminative proof, it is never to be supposed, as a matter of legal presumption, that a person has violated the criminal law; and the presumption in favor of innocence, says a learned writer, is not confined to proceedings instituted with a view of punishing the supposed offense, but holds in all civil suits where it comes collaterally in question." The learned justice then proceeds to quote two extracts from Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, and refers to Re v. Tynning, 2 Barn. & Ald. 886, and Clayton v. Wardell, 4 N. Y. 230. The cases cited sustain the decision of the court in Case v. Case. But it will be observed that in both cases there had been an actual marriage, by which, if there was a prior actual marriage, the party would have been guilty of a violation of the criminal law from having committed the offense of bigamy. Case v. Case and the two cases go no further than what is just above pointed out, and they proceed on the ground that where a presumption of marriage is met by the presumption of innocence, which the defendant, on his trial for bigamy, has a right to make, the weaker presumption gives way to the stronger, which is the presumption of innocence. This question is considered and passed on in a criminal action in People v. Feilen, 58 Cal. 218, and is thoroughly discussed in Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 157, 158, 48 Md. 397, 398 et seq. In every case above referred to, the strife was between two marriages; the antecedent marriage being one attempted to be made out by the presumption or inference from cohabitation and repute, and the other an actual marriage. See Taylor v. Taylor, 1 Lee, Eccl. 571, 5 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 454; Re v. Tynning, 2 Barn. & Ald. 886; Poultney v. Fairhaven, Brayt. 185; Senser v. Hower, 1 Pen. & W. 450; Myatt v. Myott, 44 Ill. 478; State v. Holyakins, 19 Me. 158, 159.

The presumption of innocence will only arise when there is evidence brought to show that a party has been guilty of a penal offense; and this, we think, is the meaning of the portions of the text of Best on Presumptive Evidence (page 64), and Bishop on Marriage and Divorce (sections 824, 825, referred to in Case v. Case). The language in the work on Presumptive Evidence denotes that a violation of the criminal law is referred to. The author says that the presumption of innocence is not confined to proceedings for punishing the supposed offense, but holds in all civil suits where it comes collaterally in question. What can it refer to but to the offense which is punishable? It is evident that Bishop, in the extract made in the opinion (17 Cal. pp. 600, 601), refers to adultery as an offense against the public law. He speaks of the benign influence of the presumption of innocence, "in order to prevent the suspicion that an offense has been committed." We cannot find this section (825) in the last edition of Bishop on Marriage and Divorce. In section 442 (vol. 1) Bishop states the rule thus: "The marriage has been required to be proved by evidence other than of cohabitation and repute in actions for criminal conversation, and indictments for polygamy, for adultery, for incest, and for loose and lascivious cohabitation,"—citing cases which sustain this as to adultery. It will be remarked that he confined this rule to indictments for adultery. This could only be so where adultery was an indictable offense. Now, we have no statute, and never have had one, in this State, making mere adultery a penal offense. It was not a penal offense at common law. 4 Bl. Com. 65. The statute in this State makes the living in open and notorious cohabitation and adultery an offense. See Stat. 1871-72, p. 880; People v. Gates, 46 Cal. 52.

Section 123 of the Act concerning crimes and punishments only refers to adultery between persons living within the degrees of consanguinity within which marriages are declared by law to be incestuous and void. We think that the weight of authority shows the rule to be that evidence of cohabitation and repute is admissible to show a marriage in all cases where there is no question of a public offense involved.

The statement of the rule in People v. Anderson, supra, as regards actions for divorce, is a mere dictum, outside of the case, and is not sustained by the decided cases or by the law. There are cases which tend to show that such evidence is admissible in a civil action when it proved the commission of a public offense. Archer v. Hathicock, 6 Jones, L. (N. C.) 421, 422, 423; Sneed v. Ewing, 5 J. J. Marsh. 464, 491.

In Jewell v. Jewell, 43 U. S. 1 How. 224 [11 L. ed. 110], the evidence seems to have been admitted by the lower court without objection, and the point was not distinctly made in the supreme court. In the North Carolina case it is said that the only exceptions to the rule are an indictment for bigamy and an action for criminal conversation. The court expressed the opinion that what is competent evidence in one case ought to be so in another. In this case the evidence was admitted in an action of ejectment to defeat rights under a second marriage, though the second marriage was formally solemnized and proved by direct evidence. Gardiner, J., in a dissenting opinion in Clayton v. Wardell, supra, expressed the opinion that such evidence should be held admissible in all cases. He said the distinction between civil actions and criminal or quasi criminal proceedings was established by Lord Mansfield, and has been adopted without question or investigation, apparently. We think such evidence was admissible here, and that nothing in Case v. Case is adverse to it. The point was not decided in People v. Anderson. It was not involved in the case, and we are convinced that the dictum there pronounced is not sustained by authority or law.

It appears that a deposition of the plaintiff had been taken herein previous to the trial and returned to the court below. During the cross-examination of the plaintiff, defendant's counsel, with a view of showing contradictory statements made by her, read to her from this deposition several questions and answers, and inquired of the witness "if that was correct," "Is that what you said then?" "Is that true?" An objection was made to this mode of cross-examination. The court sustained the objection, and the defendant excepted. The court, no doubt, would have allowed the defendant to put in such portions of the deposition as he might have selected to discredit the witness. The defendant certainly has a right to show the contradictory statements. To do this, as the witness was a party to the action, it was not necessary to call her attention to the statements formerly made, inconsistent with her statements made on her then examination. Her statements appearing in the deposition were admissions, and might have been offered as such. The mode of cross-examination was objectionable. It consumed time in doing what was utterly useless in asking the questions as above stated. The court has the power, and should have it, to control the mode of examination of a witness, provided it does not trench on the rights of a party. The defendant might have put in portions of the deposition to show the contradictory statements, and the court would have allowed the plaintiff to put in the remaining portions. The deposition was subsequently offered and admitted. The statements which the defendant desired to get before the court did thus get before it. In this state of the case, conceding that the court erred in its ruling, putting a stop to defendant's mode of cross-examination, the error was rendered harmless to the defendant by placing the deposition before the court as evidence; and, as no injury was done by defendant, there can be no reversal for such ruling.

It is objected that the plaintiff's counsel was permitted to ask of the plaintiff, on her re-examination, a question admitted by the court to be leading. The allowance of leading questions, it is a well-settled rule in this State, is in the discretion of the trial court, and there should be no reversal for such allowances, unless there is a manifest abuse of this discretion. As we find no such abuse here, there is no error.

The admission of the mortgage of plaintiff and defendant to W. B. Spears, over the objection of defendant that it was irrelevant, is not error. When the court tries the case, this court never reverses for the admission of irrelevant evidence, unless it appears that the court, in making its decision, relied on the irrelevant evidence. It does not appear herein that the court relied on such evidence. Conceding that the admission of the acknowledgment of the mortgage was erroneous, the court is of the opinion that the evidence is of so trifling a character that it could not have prejudiced plaintiff, and it declines to reverse for such ruling.

It is contended that there is no finding on the issue of extreme cruelty, which was pleaded by defendant in recrimination. The court is of opinion that the evidence on this issue was insufficient to have sustained or justified a finding by the court below of extreme cruelty by plaintiff to defendant. The only evidence worthy of consideration is that regarding the firing of a pistol behind defendant by plaintiff many years before the former quit living with the latter. From this circumstance, it is evident that defendant did not regard himself in peril or danger of any kind from plaintiff. If he had regarded himself in danger, he would not have continued to live with her for five or six years after the firing of the pistol occurred. As the evidence would not have justified a finding of extreme cruelty on the part of plaintiff, and as this court would have reversed for such a finding, as not justified by the evidence, if it had been made, it will not reverse for want of such finding, and send the cause back for a finding on that issue.

Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Paterson, J.

Fox, J.:

I concur in the judgment. I think that the first part of the second finding negatives every allegation of extreme cruelty made by the defendant, and that a separate finding upon that subject was unnecessary. The other errors of law, if they were errors, are of so insignificant a nature as that they could not possibly have changed the result. It is true that consent lies at the foundation of every marriage, and without consent there can be no marriage; but as was said in Campbell v. Campbell, cited by Mr. Justice Thornton, there are cases in which a tacit consent will be inferred. Even under our Code it will be presumed "that a man and woman deporting themselves as husband and wife have entered into a lawful contract of marriage." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 80.

And after a quarter of a century of that kind of deportment towards each other, and towards the world, the parties ought to be estopped to deny such presumption. Then the conclusive presumption arising under subdivision 8, § 1963, Id., ought to prevail: "Whenever a party has by his own declaration or act . . . intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration or act . . . be permitted to falsify it."

Works, J.:

I dissent. To my mind the evidence shows conclusively that these parties were never married. Cohabitation and repute may be sufficient to raise a presumption of marriage, and, if undisputed, authorize a judgment to that effect; but here the testimony of both of the parties shows beyond any question, not only that the intercourse of these parties was illicit in the beginning, but that it continued to be so up to the time of their separation. The positive and direct evidence of both of the parties is that there never was any promise or agreement to marry, or to live together as husband and wife. Therefore the evidence of cohabitation and repute, which in this case is extremely weak and unsatisfactory, cannot and should not prevail. A mere presumption of a marriage, arising from cohabitation, cannot stand as against positive evidence to the contrary by both of the parties interested.

Petition for rehearing denied.

DASHAWAY ASSOCIATION et al.

(....Cal....)

1. The donation by trustees of an incorporated benevolent association to each member in pursuance of an unanimous vote of the members present at a meeting when the vote was taken, of a certain sum for past service, when no services had been rendered other than such as the parties were bound to render as members, is a misappropriation of corporate funds, the restoration of which may be compelled by a member who was not a party to the transaction.

2. A demand on the trustees of a corporation to restore funds misapplied is not necessary before an action by a member to compel such restoration, where the trustees themselves were parties to the unlawful transaction, and defend the action on the ground that their acts were rightful.

(November 22, 1889.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco denying his motion for new trial after a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought to compel the restoration of certain corporate funds alleged to have been misappropriated. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. S. Heydenfeldt, Jr., and Joseph P. Kelly for appellant.

Messrs. Tilden & Tilden and David McClure for respondents.

Sharpstein, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit by Charles Ashton, a member of the Dashaway Association, against the corporation, its five trustees, and a majority of the other members, to compel the restoration of funds alleged to have been misappropriated. The trial court nonsuited the plaintiff, who appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The original association was an unincorporated temperance society. It was formed in January, 1859, at the Howard Engine-House, by seventeen public-spirited men, who took a pledge to abstain from all intoxicating drinks, except for medical purposes, the necessity of which was to be certified by a physician, and adopted a constitution and by-laws. The initiation fee was fixed at twenty-five cents, and the dues at twelve and one half cents a week. The preamble was as follows: "We, the undersigned, anxious to advance our own interests, and to promote a spirit of good feeling, not only amongst ourselves, but our friends, and being impressed with the importance of concentrated effort to accomplish the object, and desirous of forming ourselves into an association in which we may labor together for the end proposed, have framed the annexed constitution," etc.

It was provided that "it shall be the duty of members to seek out their friends in the city and vicinity, and bring them to the meetings, and introduce to the members," and "to assist those members who are in need to obtain employment, and aid and encourage the poor and needy, as far as lay in their power." The name adopted was the "Dashaway Association," the meaning of which is said to be that it was the object to encourage the members and their friends to "dash away" the intoxicating cup from their lips. In May, 1859, a more extended constitution was adopted. After reciting that the original plans were "to bring under our banner all inebriates, not only here, but in other parts of the State," it provided for the establishment of branch associations, and that all persons admitted as members should take the pledge. The substance of the previous constitution was adopted.

The enterprise seems to have received the approbation and assistance of the public. The press gave it encouragement; the Reverend Thomas Starr King consented to deliver a lecture for its benefit; and donations of books, of building materials and of money were received. On one occasion the Association received a "donation in money" of $ 57.50; on another, a subscription of $1,200; on another, $2,107.83; on another, $134.50; on another, $154.75,—and letters of sympathy were received from other States. In 1860 the Association purchased a lot on Post Street, near Dupont, for the sum of $6,250, and a building was erected upon it for the use of the Association. This is the lot which was subsequently sold, as mentioned below. It was mortgaged for part of the purchase money, and subsequently other mortgages were placed upon it. In 1862 the Association was incorporated. The articles were evidently framed under the provisions of the incorporation of "religious, social, benevolent and learned associations." 1 Hittell, Gen. Laws, § 1024 et seq.

There was no capital stock. The articles state that the organization was "a benevolent Association, formed for the purpose of promoting the cause of temperance." A "home" for the care of inebriates was provided, under the auspices of the Association; but for this purpose a separate corporation was formed.

The Association had a numerous membership. "There were 3,163 names before the incorporation, and 4,904 since the incorporation." In 1892, however, from some cause which is not explained by the record, the membership had dwindled to 59; and in the following year notice was given of a meeting of members to consider the question of selling the property above mentioned, in order to pay the indebtedness, "and to reinvest in other property suitable for the Association." At this meeting a resolution was passed that the trustees be instructed to sell the property, pay the indebtedness "and purchase other cheaper property suitable for the uses and purposes of the Association." A petition for leave to sell the property was accordingly filed in the superior court, stating, among other things, that the Association was incorporated "purely and solely for the benevolent and laudable purpose of aiding and promoting the cause of temperance, and not pecuniary profit;" and the court granted leave to sell, reciting in its order the above mentioned resolution. The property was then sold for the sum of $150,000. Of this sum $45,000 was used in discharging indebtedness; $31,543.54 was placed in savings banks, where it is to be presumed that it now is; and $73,-

500 was divided among 49 members, including the trustees. The answers deny that the defendants "unlawfully or fraudulently" took or received any of the money, or that they took or received any money "that was held by said corporation in trust," but do not deny the taking or receiving, and the evidence of the taking is uncontradicted.

At a meeting of the members held in December, 1883, the minute-book shows the following entry: "Brother Eagnu then moved that the Association donate to each member in good standing the sum of $1,500 for past services, on signing a receipt for the same. Carried unanimously." And this is followed by a receipt in the following form: "San Francisco, December 31, 1883. We, the undersigned, members of the Dashaway Association, acknowledge the receipt of $1,500, donated to us for past services by order of the Association." This receipt was signed by 49 members, including the trustees, the sum of $1,500 being opposite each name.

It was admitted at the trial "that there were no services rendered by the defendant members other than in the line of being good and efficient members of the organization, in accordance with the constitution and by-laws and general objects of the Association, and that that is all any of the defendants rendered to the society." The by-laws provide that "no officer of this Association shall receive compensation for his services, except the secretary and collector, who shall receive such compensation as may from time to time be fixed by the Association."

It is admitted by the pleadings that the Association "still is" a corporation, and no proceedings for its voluntary dissolution are shown.

The argument for the respondents is that the organization was not a charity, in its legal sense, and that therefore it could do what it pleased with its property. "Take all the evidence," say the learned counsel, "search the record through and through, and not one word indicating a charity can be found." We do not find it necessary to decide this question, and, for the purposes of this opinion, shall assume that the Association stands upon the same footing as any other private corporation. So regarding it, we think it clear that any member has the right to the aid of the courts in setting aside such a plain misappropriation of the corporate funds as is above shown. That any stockholder or member has this right in equity is well established. The rule is thus stated in a recent work: "Even the majority have no right to direct the affairs of a corporation except in accordance with the provisions of its charter, for the powers of the majority are derived wholly from the agreement of the stockholders, as set out in the charter; and every individual stockholder has the right to stand upon his contract, and forbid any departure from its terms. It may accordingly be stated as a rule that any departure from the chartered purposes of a corporation is an injury to every individual stockholder, for which equity will, under proper circumstances, provide a remedy." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 403.

Another learned writer says: "It is ultra vires and illegal for the board of directors to donate the funds of the corporation to charitable or public purposes, or to aid corporations of a similar character, however praiseworthy the purpose of the donation may be. Nor can the directors legally use the funds of the corporation to induce promoters to abandon a proposed rival company. A stockholder may enjoin the directors from making free of tolls a bridge from which a corporation derives its income. The directors may be held liable for allowing the president to use the corporate funds for lobbying purposes. An unreasonable use of the corporate profits of a leased railroad to build up and improve the lessor railroad, without reference to the rights of the former, has been held to be good cause of complaint on the part of a stockholder in the leased railroad company; and, in general, any misapplication or waste of the property of a corporation may be remedied by a member thereof." Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 674.

The Supreme Court of Rhode Island, in reference to the misappropriation of corporate funds by a director, said: "The jurisdiction does not appear to be so firmly settled and defined in England as in this country; but we do not believe any English judge has ever decided that a president or director who fraudulently converts or embezzles corporate funds cannot be sued in equity by a stockholder, when the corporation willfully neglects or refuses to bring the suit. Indeed, to hold that a corporation could gratuitously condone or release such a fraud by anything short of unanimous consent would be monstrous; for it would be, in effect, to hold that a president or director who can control a majority vote in the corporation may rob or despoil it with impunity." Hazard v. Durant, 11 lt. 1. 206, 207.

In accordance with those principles, it has been held that a stockholder may restrain the directors from paying an unfounded claim of the secretary for extra services (Butts v. Wood, 37 N. Y. 817), and may compel the repayment of funds misappropriated by the directors (Sears v. Iotchkins, 25 Conn. 177), and may recover from a trustee property of the corporation which he has converted to his own use (Carpenter v. Roberts, 56 How. Pr. 210), and may prevent corporate securities from being misapplied to the benefit of other corporations (Chicago v. Cameron, 120 Ill. 447, 9 West. Rep. 507), and may have annulled a lease made in excess of corporate powers (Mills v. Central R. Co. 41 N. J. Eq. 1, 2 Cent. Rep. 239), and may prevent the collection of payment of a tax illegally levied (Dodys v. Woolsey, 59 U. S. 18 How. 231, 15 L. ed. 401), and may prevent the payment of dividends out of a fund which ought to have been appropriated to repairs of the company's works (Dent v. London Tramways Co. L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 844), and may prevent the conversion of the corporate assets by the officers (Atlanta Real Estate Co. v. Atlanta Nat. Bank, 75 Ga. 45), and may have restrained acts which amount to a violation of trust, or a breach of the charter (March v. Eastern R. Co. 40 N. H. 548; Wilcox v. Nickel, 11 Neb. 154; Teacout v. Des Moines B. G. Street R. Co. 75 Iowa, 527; Manderson v. Commercial Bank, 23 Pa. 379), or which amount to a fraud upon the company (Ryan v. Levenworth, A. & N. W. R. Co. 21 Kan. 365), or to a breach of its charter. Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 672.

In California the rule was laid down in 7 L. R. A.

Wright v. Oronille G. S. & O. Mining Co. 40 Cal. 20, in which case it was held that a stockholder could compel the company to refund the sum paid by him for the redemption of corporate property which the directors had allowed to be sold, and had wrongfully neglected to redeem, and Wallace, J., delivering the opinion, said: "It is settled that courts of equity in this country will, at the instance of a stockholder, control a corporation and its officers, and restrain them from doing acts even within the scope of corporate authority, if such acts, when done, would, under the particular circumstances, amount to a breach of the very trust upon which, as we have seen, the authority itself has been conferred." Dodge v. Woolsey, 59 U. S. 18 How. 341 [15 L. ed. 404].

"And upon the same principle the court will, even after such an act has been done, relieve an injured stockholder from loss, if, in the mean time, no superior equity has intervened, nor the rights of innocent third parties attached." See also Neill v. Hill, 16 Cal. 145; Beuch v. Cooper, 73 Cal. 99; Chicago v. Cameron, 120 Ill. 443, 9 West. Rep. 507.

And the relief does not depend upon the existence of a fraudulent intent, although such intent very frequently exists.

Now, in the present case there was a plain misappropriation of corporate funds. The corporation was not dissolved, or, so far as appears, to be dissolved. It was a simple case of trustees who were in possession and in control of corporate funds, acting in pursuance of a vote of the majority of the members, "donating" the corporate funds to themselves and other members upon the pretext of "past services," although the fact was, as admitted at the trial, that no services had been rendered other than such as the parties were bound to render as members of the Association. The answers deny that the Association was not a corporation for profit. But it is too plain for discussion that this denial was untrue. The corporation was not for profit. Its articles define it as "a benevolent Association, formed for the purpose of promoting the cause of temperance;" and it is evident, as stated in the petition for leave to sell the property, that the Association "was incorporated purely and solely for the benevolent and laudable purpose of aiding and promoting the cause of temperance, and not pecuniary profit." This being so, the division of more than one half of the corporate property among 49 members was a diversion of the same from the cause of temperance, which was the "benevolent and laudable" purpose of the institution, into the private pockets of said members. It was an attempt to make a profit out of an undertaking which was not for profit. It is not inconsistent with the conclusion that the preamble of the constitution of the unincorporated association stated that the object of the members was "to advance our own interests." It is perfectly clear, from the circumstances, that this meant their interests with respect to temperance and sobriety. But, aside from this, the old constitution was superseded by the articles of incorporation, which explicitly define the object of the Association, as above stated.

If such a transaction as appears here would be sanctioned, the majority of the members of any club, or social, religious or benevolent society, could, without winking up the concern, divide up the funds whenever they felt in need of a little money. It does not appear that the plaintiff consented to the proceeding; he is not shown to have been present at the meeting at which the resolution above quoted was "unanimously carried;" his name does not appear on the receipt above set forth; the resolution offered by him at the meeting preliminary to the sale seems to us to have been perfectly proper; and his subsequent proceedings show, to his credit, that he was not a party to the transaction.

It is argued for the respondents, however, that a member or stockholder cannot have redress for any wrong or injury to the corporation "until after he has exhausted all the means within his reach to obtain redress of his grievances. He must make an earnest effort with the managing body of the corporation." This is undoubtedly the general rule. But the complaint alleges that the trustees of the corporation "control and manage its affairs, and were parties to the said unlawful and fraudulent acts, being aided and abetted by the said other defendants members; that it would be futile and useless to make a demand upon said corporation defendant, or upon its trustees or officers, to commence a suit to obtain the relief which the plaintiff seeks, or any relief whatever." The answers deny that the trustees "were ever parties to any unlawful or fraudulent transaction," but do not deny the remainder of the allegation; and from the whole case it is apparent that the defendants claimed the right to do what they did, and that the trustees were parties to the transaction. Under these circumstances, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to demand that they should take action. "The law does not require a useless act to be performed; and when it is claimed, from the answer, that, if a demand had been made, it would have been refused, it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to object that no demand was made." Parrott v. Byers, 40 Cal. 622, 623. See also Henth v. Erie R. Co. 8 Blatchf. 347; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 895; 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. 10.

We see no material error in the admission of evidence; but, if there had been, it would not affect the result here. McCloud v. O'Neill, 16 Cal. 397.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Thornton, J.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently granted, and on May 8, 1890, Sharpstein, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal was heard in Department 2, which reversed the judgment and order of the court below. An opinion was filed November 22, 1889. Afterward a petition that the cause be heard in bank was filed and granted and the case has been argued in bank, but the argument has failed to convince us that the decision of the department was erroneous; and for the reasons stated in the opinion of the department the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

*Head notes by the COURT.

NOTE.—Notice; lis pendens.

Two things seem indispensable to give effect to the doctrine of lis pendens: (1) that the litigation must be about some specific thing which must necessarily be affected by the termination of the suit; and (2) that the particular property involved in the suit must be so definite in the description that anyone reading it can learn thereby what property is intended to be made the subject of litigation. Houston v. Timmerman, 17 Or. 490.

Notice of lis pendens does not take effect until service of process, or its publication in case of an absent defendant. Cassidy v. Kluge, 73 Tex. 154; Tharpe v. Dunlap, 4 Heisk. 674; Skeel v. Spraker, 8 Paige, 189; Murray v. Finster, 2 Johns. Ch. 155; Heatley v. Finster, 2 Johns. Ch. 158.

The doctrine of lis pendens operates as notice only from the time the complaint is filed and summons is served, and of such facts as are alleged in the pleadings, which are pertinent to the issue, and 7 L. R. A.

than one county, will not be charged with constructive notice of an action for the recovery of such property, pending in a county other than that in which the property is situated.

2. The doctrine of lis pendens does not apply, unless the court has acquired, in some manner, jurisdiction of the subject matter involved in the suit. Where, therefore, in an action to recover real property which is not an entire tract situate in more than one county, of the contents of exhibits. Walker v. Goldsmith, 14 Or. 149; Center v. Planters & M. Bank, 22 Ala. 743; Hayden v. Bucklin, 9 Paige, 511; King v. Bill, 28 Conn. 593; *Murray v. While strangers to the record are not affected with constructive notice of the pendency of an action involving the title to land lying in another county, unless the notice required by N. C. Code, § 220, has been given, even purchasers for a valuable consideration are affected with notice of an action brought in the county where the land lies, if the pleadings describe it with reasonable certainty; and they take title subject to the final decree rendered in the action. Spencer v. Credle, 103 N. C. 68.

but a separate tract lying wholly in one county, the action is not brought in the county where the subject of the action is located, a bona fide purchaser of the property for a valuable consideration, without actual notice, and residing in the county where the property is situated, will not be charged with constructive notice of the pendency of such action at the time of his purchase, so as to prevent his acquiring a valid interest in the property.

3. The heirs of P. brought an action in the Court of Common Pleas of Union County to partition two tracts of land situated respectively in Union County and Delaware County, and also, to set aside a deed, duly recorded, from P. to D. and L., of the Delaware tract, and to recover the same. The land in Union County was not an entire tract with the land in Delaware County, but the two were separate tracts, one situated entirely in Union County, and one entirely in Delaware County. While the action was pending in the court of common pleas, and before the rendition of final judgment in the case, D., one of the defendants, mortgaged his interest in the Delaware tract to M., who was, at the date of the commencement of the action, and ever since has been, a resident of Delaware County. M. had no actual notice of the pendency of the action, at the time of taking the mortgage; was not a party to the action; and the final judgment rendered in the action was never recorded in Delaware County. Held, that under §§ 5055 and 5056 of the Revised Statutes, M. was not charged with constructive notice of the pendency of the action, so as to be prevented from acquiring an interest in the subject matter thereof covered by the mortgage, as against the title of the parties to the pending litigation.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Delaware County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff, rendered upon appeal from the Court of Common Pleas, in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

Statement by Dickman, J..

The defendant in error, Mary J. Shafer, filed her petition in the Court of Common Pleas of Delaware County, against Daniel S. Benton and the plaintiffs in error, Lewis Benton, Aaron Clover and Nancy Clover, asking for the foreclosure of a mortgage made to her October 28, 1882, by Daniel S. Benton, on the one undivided fourth part of 122½ acres of land in Delaware County, Ohio, described in a deed dated August 9, 1878, from Phebe Benton to Lewis Benton and Daniel S. Benton, in which she conveyed to them the undivided half part thereof. The mortgage was given to secure the payment of Daniel S. Benton's note for $571.28, dated October 17, 1882, payable one year after date, with interest at 8 per cent per annum, and was duly recorded in Delaware County, November 23, 1882, in vol. 28, p. 149, of the Records of Mortgages.

Daniel S. Benton was in default for answer and demurrer.

The defendant, Lewis Benton, set forth in his answer to the petition, that Daniel S. Benton was not the owner of the one-fourth part of the real estate described in the petition, but, as one of the heirs-at-law of Phebe Benton, was the owner of only one forty-eighth part thereof; that in January, 1880, the heirs-at-law of Phebe Benton instituted proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas of Union County, Ohio, for partition of the premises described in the petition; and that at a public auction in partition he, Lewis Benton, became the purchaser of the premises, and afterwards sold them to Aaron Clover, who entered into possession of the same.

Aaron Clover and Nancy Clover, by their joint answer to the petition, set up the purchase from Lewis Benton, and prayed that their title might be protected.

The court of common pleas found that the mortgage from Daniel S. Benton to Mary J. Shafer was the first and best lien on an undivided forty-eighth part of the 122½ acres of land; that Daniel S. Benton did not have any title to the premises in the petition described, by virtue of the deed from Phebe Benton to Daniel S. Benton and Lewis Benton, but owned in fee simple the undivided forty-eighth part of the premises, as heir-at-law of Phebe Benton, at the time he executed the mortgage to Mary J. Shafer; that the condition of defeasance in said mortgage had been broken, and that Mary J. Shafer was thereby entitled to have the defendants' equity of redemption foreclosed.

The plaintiff excepted to the judgment of the court of common pleas, and appealed to the circuit court. In the circuit court the cause was submitted on the pleadings, and the evidence embodied in an agreed statement of facts, which is as follows:

It is agreed by the parties in this action:

That a case was commenced and prosecuted in Union County, Ohio, in which Stephen Cranston and others, heirs-at-law of Phebe Benton, deceased, were plaintiffs, and Orson Benton, Daniel S. Benton, Lewis Benton and others were defendants, by petition filed January 17, 1880, in which the plaintiff sought to set aside the deed of conveyance made by Phebe Benton to said Daniel S. and Lewis Benton of the tract of land in Delaware County, Ohio, upon which Mary J. Shafer holds the mortgage which she seeks to foreclose in the action at bar, and also to recover the said real estate situate in Delaware County, Ohio, and the partition of the same among the heirs of said Phebe Benton, deceased. Also in the same action was sought the partition of another tract of land in Union County, Ohio, among said heirs. And that the land in Union County, Ohio, is not a continuous or entire tract with the said land in Delaware County, Ohio, but are separate and independent tracts several miles apart.

The land in Delaware County is in Virginia Military Surveys Nos. 2546 and 2897, and the land in Union County in Virginia Military Survey No. 4404.

That Mary J. Shafer was not a party to said action in Union County.

That the suit in Union County was pending when Daniel S. Benton executed and delivered the mortgage to Mary J. Shafer on the lands in Delaware County, but the final decree in said action was not rendered until March 10, 1883, in the District Court of Union County, on appeal from the decision of the court of common pleas where judgment had been rendered in favor of said Lewis and Daniel S. Benton, sustaining the validity of said deed from Phebe Benton to said Daniel S. and Lewis Benton, of the said land in Delaware County. The decision of said common pleas court was rendered May 18, 1881, and on appeal from said common pleas court the district court rendered the following decision March 10, 1888 viz.:

"On consideration whereof the court do find that the equity of the case is with the plaintiff and cross-petitioners, and that the deeds of conveyance mentioned in the pleadings from Phebe Benton to Orson Benton, Lewis Benton and Daniel S. Benton, dated August 9, 1878, should be set aside and held for naught; and therefore it is ordered, adjudged and decreed by the court that said deeds of conveyance be and they are hereby set aside and held for naught, and said estate of Hiram and Phebe Benton is hereby ordered to be partitioned and settled the same as if said deed had never been made."

And finding and decreeing among other things that the interest of Daniel S. Benton, as one of the heirs of said Phebe Benton in the land in Delaware County, was one forty-eighth part, which amounted to $84.78, net proceeds, and ordered the partition be made of said premises.

Which judgment was affirmed by the supreme court and certiorari to the Court of Union County, and the commissioners of partition in said case, appointed by said court, having reported the premises not susceptible of division, the court thereupon ordered said premises to be sold by the sheriff, which was accordingly done, and Lewis Benton became the purchaser at said sale of said tract of land in Delaware County, consisting of 122½ acres, and received his deed for the same, and afterward conveyed the same to Aaron Clover, defendant, and the proceeds of the sale, by the sheriff aforesaid were distributed according to the order of the Union County Court to said heirs of Phebe Benton, deceased, and as one of said heirs, to Daniel S. Benton, one forty-eighth part.

The above record of facts is admitted so far as the record thereof may be competent evidence in the trial of this case.

And it is further admitted as a fact in this case that Phebe Benton is the person who made the deed of conveyance of the undivided one half of said land in Delaware County, Ohio, of which she had the title in fee simple, and that she died August 20, 1879.

And it is admitted as a fact that the deed made by said Phebe Benton to Daniel S. Benton and Lewis Benton is a general warranty deed, purporting to convey the undivided one half of said land in Delaware County to said Daniel S. and Lewis Benton, their heirs and assigns in fee simple, and that the date of said deed is August 9, 1878, and the same was filed in the recorder's office of Delaware County, and recorded in volume 72, pages 33 and 34, August 27, 1878, Record of Deeds of Delaware County, and under which deed Lewis and Daniel S. Benton went into possession, and under which title Mary J. Shafer claims her rights in this action as well as to whatever title the said Daniel S. Benton had as one of the heirs of Phebe Benton, deceased.

It is further admitted as a fact that the record of the pendency of said suit in Union County, or the proceedings or decree rendered therein, are not recorded in Delaware County, Ohio.

Mary J. Shafer's mortgage, it is agreed, is dated October 28, 1882, filed for record November 11, 1883.

It is also agreed that it is a fact that the plaintiff, Mary J. Shafer, was, at the date of the commencement of the action in Union County, and ever since has been, a resident of Delaware County, and never a resident of Union County.

And that she had no actual notice in fact, other than the notice which is presumed in law, of the pendency of said suit in Union County, or of the proceedings therein, when Daniel S. Benton executed and delivered to her the note and mortgage in suit.

Upon the foregoing agreed statement of facts, the finding and judgment of the circuit court were as follows:

"The court find on the issue joined between the plaintiff and the defendants that the equity of the case is with the plaintiff. And the court find that the defendant, Daniel S. Benton, has been duly served with notice by publication, according to law, of the pending of this action, and is in default for answer and demurrer, and that the allegations of the petition as to him are thereby conceded by him to be true. And the court do further find all the other issues between the plaintiff and said defendants, Lewis Benton and Aaron and Nancy Clover, in favor of the plaintiff and against the said defendants. And that there is due the plaintiff from the defendant, Daniel S. Benton, on the promissory note set forth in the petition, with the interest thereon to the first day of this term, to wit, December 14, 1886, the sum of $761.44, with interest at 8 per cent from that date.

"The court further find that in order to secure the payment of said note and interest, the said Daniel S. Benton executed and delivered to said Mary J. Shafer, plaintiff, his certain mortgage as in the petition described, and on the premises therein described. That said mortgage was duly recorded in volume 28, page 149, etc., November 23, 1882, in the Records of Mortgages of Delaware County, Ohio, and is a valid lien on the premises in the petition described, and that the conditions in said mortgage have been broken and said deed has become absolute.

"It is therefore adjudged and decreed by the court that unless the defendant, Daniel S. Benton, shall within five days from the entry of this decree pay or cause to be paid to the clerk of the court of common pleas, to which this case is remanded for further proceedings, the costs of this case, and to the plaintiff herein the sum of $761.44, so found due as aforesaid, with interest at 8 per cent from the 14th day of December, 1886, the defendant's equity of redemption be foreclosed and said premises be sold, and that an order of sale issue therefor to the sheriff of Delaware County, Ohio, directing him to appraise, advertise and sell said premises as upon execution, and report his proceedings to the Court of Common Pleas of Delaware County, Ohio.

"It is further ordered that this cause be remanded to the Common Pleas Court of Delaware County, Ohio, to carry this decree into execution and for all further proceedings."

To all of which findings, rulings and judgment, the defendants did at the time, by their counsel, except, and thereupon the defendants filed a motion for a new trial, for reasons set forth in said motion, which motion was overruled by the court, to which the defendants did at the time except.

This proceeding in error is prosecuted to reverse the judgment of the circuit court.

Dickman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of the suit in Union County was to set aside the deed of conveyance, executed by Phebe Benton to Daniel S. Benton and Lewis Benton, of the tract of land in Delaware County, upon which Mary J. Shafer holds the mortgage in controversy, also, to recover the real property embraced in the mortgage, and to cause partition of the same to be made among the heirs of Phebe Benton. In the same suit, partition among the same heirs was sought of another tract of land, situated in Union County. The land in Union County is not a continuous and entire tract with the land in Delaware County, but the two are separate and independent tracts, several miles apart.

Although when the estate is situated in two or more counties, proceedings for partition may be had in any county in which such estate is situated, and a person may recover real property when an entire tract, yet, in partition common, coparcener or otherwise, is entitled to be named as defendant; and in an action to recover an entire tract and situate in one county, all persons claiming interest in the property may be made parties.

Conceding that all the proceedings before the court at the commencement of the action in Union County, and when Mary J. Shafer received the mortgage from Daniel S. Benton, the question whether, upon the agreed facts of the case, she is to be concluded by the judgment rendered in the Union County action she was not a party to at the commencement and ever since, she was a resident of Delaware County; actual notice of the suit in Union County of the proceedings therein, Benton executed and delivered the mortgage and mortgage in litigation, after searching the records in Delaware County, where she found Phebe Benton to Daniel S. Benton, and no record of any suit affecting the title of the land.

The decision of the Court of Appeals of Union County was rendered and the final decree in the action on appeal, March 10, 1883, was affirmed by the court. The mortgage to Mary J. Shafer dated October 28, 1882, and was November 11, 1882. It is contended that, notwithstanding the facts of the suit in Union County was pending, Daniel S. Benton executed after the mortgage on the land in Union County, she acquired no interest in the matter of the suit, as against the other plaintiffs in error.

The rule concerning the effect of a judgment rendered by a court having no jurisdiction, would be as stern and inequitable in its application.

In Bellamy v. Sabine, 1 De. 1, was said by Turner, L. J.: "I do not speak of lis pendens as affecting through the doctrine of notice, but I doubtless the language of the statute describes its operation. It affects cause it amounts to notice, but it does not allow litigant parties to pending the litigation, rights to be in dispute, so as to prejudice a party." And yet the doctrine has not been eliminated in determining of alienating property in dispute litigation.

But, the rule concerning lis pendens has always been regarded by courts as a harsh one in its application to purchasers for value.

In Hayden v. Bucklan, 9 Paige 10, was said by Walworth: "This common law requiring purchasers at their peril of the pendency of suits in court for the recovery of the property to purchase, although it is near have been commenced, and always been considered a hard rule, and is by no means a favorite with the court of chancery." The stringency of the rule has led the English Parliament and the Legislatures of many States to interfere, resulting in most material statutory modifications and restrictions. An example of such legislation is found in the English statute which provides that a pending suit will not affect a purchaser for value and without express notice, unless a notice of lis pendens has been properly registered in compliance with the statutory directions. Stat. 2 and 3 Vict. chap. 11, § 7. Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 639, 640.

Our own statutory provisions are found in §§ 5055 and 5056 of the Revised Statutes. Section 5055 reads as follows: "When the summons has been served or publication made, the action is pending so as to charge third persons with notice of its pendency; and while pending, no interest can be acquired by third persons in the subject matter thereof as against the plaintiff's title."

Under this section, if the land mortgaged to Mary J. Shafer had been situated in Union County instead of Delaware County, she would have taken the mortgage with constructive notice of the pending litigation, and would have acquired no interest in the property, as against the title of the plaintiffs in the action. The general rule is that, as to real property located within the jurisdiction of the court where its judgments and decrees may become or be made liens upon the property, all men must take notice of and be bound by the pending litigation without regard to residence. But a mortgage of real property not part of an entire tract situate in more than one county, will not be charged with constructive notice of an action for the recovery of such property, pending in a county other than that in which the property is situated.

Section 5056 of the Revised Statutes, on the subject of lis pendens as to suits in other counties, provides as follows: "When any part of real property, the subject matter of an action, is situate in any county or counties other than the one in which the action is brought, a certified copy of the judgment in such action must be recorded in the recorder's office of such other county or counties, before it shall operate therein as notice so as to charge third persons as provided in the preceding section; but it shall operate as such notice, without record, in the county where it is rendered."

By this section of the Statutes, where part of the real property in litigation is located in the county where the action is brought, and part in another county, the judgment, in the county where it is rendered, is made to operate as notice of the pending of the action, without record. In the county where the action is brought and judgment rendered, and the real property or a part thereof is situated, it is presumed, under the Statute, that a purchaser of the subject matter of the suit situated in that county has knowledge of the prior proceedings upon which the judgment is founded, without regard to its record. But in a county where the action is not brought, and the judgment is not rendered, and the title to real property therein located is sought to be changed or affect such knowledge of the pending action or proceedings leading to the judgment, and hence the Statute requires the judgment to be recorded in such county before it can operate therein as notice to a purchaser, as provided in the preceding § 5055 of the Revised Statutes.

In the case at bar, it is among the agreed facts that the proceedings, or decrees rendered, in the suit in Union County, have not been recorded in the County of Delaware.

If the purchaser of a tract of land situated entirely in the county of his domicile, who has no actual notice or information of any judicial proceedings in any county in reference to such land, searches the records of the county where the land is located, and finds no pending proceedings, judgment liens or other incumbrances affecting the title to the same, it is not the intent of the Statute that such purchaser shall be compelled to examine the records of the courts of every county in the State, to find whether a suit is pending that would affect the title. And the section of the Statute now under consideration, in the protection of the innocent purchaser for value and without actual notice, accordingly provides that a judgment rendered in a county other than that in which the purchased part of the land lies shall be recorded in the county where such land is situated, before it shall operate therein as notice of the pendency of an action in the county where such judgment was rendered.

But the doctrine of lis pendens, which has been invoked in behalf of the plaintiffs in error, rests upon the jurisdiction of the court over the subject matter involved in the suit. "To make the pendency of a suit notice, so as to affect the conscience of a purchaser, it is essential that the court have jurisdiction over the thing." McLean, J., in Carrington v. Brents, 1 McLean, 167.

In Jones v. Luak, 2 Met. (Ky.) 886, it is said by Duvall, J.: "Unless the petition shows upon its face a case for the jurisdiction of the chancellor, the proceeding cannot operate as a lis pendens, even from the date of the service of process, so as to affect the property sought to be subjected, or to overreach a subsequent sale or other disposition of it." See also Fonbl. Eq. B. 2, chap. 6, § 3, note n; Sorrell v. Carpenter, 2 P. Wms. 482; Worsley v. Earl of Scarborough, 3 Atk. 302; Bishop of Winchester v. Paine, 11 Ves. Jr. 194; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 500; Bennett, Lis Pendens, §§ 98-100.

It is true that the action in Union County was to have partition of lands lying in that county, and also in Delaware County; and when the estate to be partitioned is situated in two or more counties, the proceedings, as before observed, may be had in any county wherein a part of such estate is situated. But, the purpose of that action, as appears from the agreed statement of facts, was also to set aside the deed of conveyance made by Phebe Benton to Daniel S. Benton and Lewis Benton, of the tract of land in Delaware County mortgaged to Mary J. Shafer, "and to recover the said real estate situated in Delaware County."

By § 5028 of the Revised Statutes, "when the property is situated in more than one county, the action may be brought in either; tract."

The mortgaged real property situated in Delaware County was not part of an entire tract situate in more than one county, but was a separate and independent tract of land located entirely in Delaware County. As the embraced in the mortgage was located, the defendant in error, Mary J. Shafer, cannot be held chargeable with constructive notice of the pendency of the action.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Elizabeth MOLETOR by Guardian ad Litem released on bail or acquittal on trial he is an a defense to the action. This plea was sustained by the court, and the defendant was discharged from custody. Within ten minutes after his discharge, and before he had departed from the court-room, the deputy sheriff made service of summons and complaint, and order of arrest, upon him, at the suit of the plaintiff, for a breach of promise. It appears that the defendant, at the time of the alleged seduction, was a resident of Sheboygan County. He left the State in January, 1888, and remained outside the State, except that he returned in the nighttime in the same month, and transacted some business, and immediately left. He was brought back on a requisition as a defendant in a criminal action, and as a fugitive from justice. It is said by the counsel for appellant that the affidavit of the defendant upon which the order of the court setting aside the service and order of arrest is based, is insufficient, because it fails to show any fraud or abuse of the process of the court by the appellant, or by any person acting for her, in the procurement of the return of the defendant on the criminal prosecution; nor does it show that the defendant was, at the time he so returned on the requisition, a bona fide citizen of Illinois. But it appears from the affidavit of the plaintiff which was used to obtain the order of arrest that the defendant was not a resident of this State, but resided in the City of Chicago, and that he was about to return to that State; and, while the promise of marriage was made, and the alleged seduction was accomplished, in 1887, it does not appear that the plaintiff had anything to do in procuring the defendant's return on the requisition of the governor, nor does it appear that there was any fraud used on the part of anyone to get the defendant within the State. In that respect the case is distinguishable from Townsend v. Smith, 47 Wis. 628, and cases where jurisdiction is obtained by fraudulent means.

It is assumed, in this case, as a fact, that the defendant had committed the crime of seduction, as alleged, and had withdrawn himself from the State to avoid a prosecution therefor, so as to be a fugitive from justice in a legal sense. Still, having been forcibly brought to the State on a requisition, and the court having exhausted its jurisdiction over him in respect to the crime with which he was charged, could he properly be arrested in a civil action until a reasonable time and opportunity had been given him, after his discharge, to return to the State from which he had been forcibly taken? This is the question involved in the appeal; and we think sound principle requires that, where a person has been brought within the jurisdiction of a court upon a requisition as a fugitive from justice, and has been tried for, or discharged as to, the offense charged against him, that he ought not to be subject to arrest on a civil process until a reasonable time and opportunity had been given him to return to the State from which he was taken.

In the courts of the United States, the weight of judicial opinion is in favor of the proposition that, where a party in good faith is brought within the jurisdiction of a State, or detained therein, being a nonresident, either as a party to a suit, or as a witness in another suit, he is not subject to service. Small v. Montgomery, 23 Fed. Rep. 707; Juneau Bank v. McSpedan, 57 L. R. A.

Biss. 64; United States v. Bridgman, 9 Biss. 221; Blair v. Turtle, 1 McCrary, 872, 5 Fed. Rep. 394; Atchison v. Morris, 11 Fed. Rep. 582.

Many of the state courts hold the same rule. Compton v. Wilder, 40 Ohio St. 180; People v. Judge, 40 Mich. 780; Cannon's Case, 47 Mich. 482; Baldwin v. Judge, 48 Mich. 525; Jacobson v. Homer, 76 Mich. 284; Sherman v. Gundlach, 87 Minn. 118; Chubbuck v. Cleveland, 87 Minn. 466; Palmer v. Rowan, 21 Neb. 452; Wanzer v. Bright, 52 Ill. 35; Williams ad. Reed, 29 N. J. L. 885; Hill v. Goodrich, 32 Conn. 588.

The last three cases go upon the same ground as Townsend v. Smith, supra.

The reason for the rule that a person is exempt from arrest under the circumstances disclosed in this case is that sound public policy requires that a person shall be privileged from arrest while going to or from court in all judicial proceedings. The privilege should exist to subserve great public interests, and the due administration of justice. Moreover, as was said by Campbell, J., in Cannon's Case: "It is very well known that the perversion of extradition proceedings has on more than one occasion led to difficulties between nations, and to refusals by state executives to deliver up persons charged with crime whose arrest was supposed to be desired for sinister purposes." The temptation is certainly strong to make such requisitions subservient to private interests; and they are often resorted to to enforce a collection of private debts, or to remove a citizen from his home into a foreign jurisdiction, in order to get service on him in a civil action. For the most cogent reasons, therefore, we think courts of justice are bound to see that no improper use be made of such proceedings, which would look like a violation of good faith, and a perversion of measures which had to be resorted to in order to bring the party accused within their jurisdiction. We do not deem it necessary to comment in detail upon all the cases cited. We will observe, however, that in cases of extradition by a foreign government, under a treaty, the Supreme Court of the United States holds that a person who has been brought within the jurisdiction of a court by virtue of proceedings under an extradition treaty could only be tried for one of the offenses described in said treaty, and for the offense with which he is charged in the proceedings for his extradition, until a reasonable time and opportunity had been given him, after his release or trial upon such charge, to return to the country from whose asylum he had been forcibly taken under those proceedings. United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407 [80 L. ed. 425].

A distinction is made in some of the authorities between civil and criminal cases. In criminal cases, some courts hold that even a forcible seizure in another country, and the transfer by violence or fraud to this country, is no sufficient reason why the party should not answer when brought within the jurisdiction of a court which has the right to try him for such an offense. See Ker v. Illinois, 119 U. S. 436 [80 L. ed. 421]; Mahon v. Justice, 127 U. S. 700 [32 L. ed. 288].

The offense having been committed in the State to which the party is brought, he may be there tried for it; and neither comity to a sister

State, nor any just appreciation of the rights of a citizen, entitle him to be released. He may be held to answer for the crime he has committed. This question is fully considered in State v. Stewart, 60 Wis. 587. But it is obvious there is no fair analogy between civil and criminal cases in this respect, and a different rule applies.

It follows from these views that the order of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

A gripman on a cable car is required to use ordinary care to prevent collision with wagons driven in the street. Pope v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. (Mo.) Jan. 27, 1890.

Law demands of the gripman in a cable car a vigilance corresponding to the responsibility placed upon him. Potts v. Chicago City R. Co. 83 Fed. Rep. 610.

Pulling down curtains to keep rain out of a car is not negligence on the part of the conductor, although it prevents the view of sides of the street. Ibid.

Stepping on the track of a street railroad, whether of horse railroad or grip cable-road, without first stopping to see whether a car is approaching, is not as matter of law, without regard to circumstances, negligence. The character of such action is a question for the jury. See note to Chicago City R. Co. v. Robinson (Ill.) 4 L. R. A. 128.

Contributory negligence bars a recovery. See notes to Erickson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 5 L. R. A. 787; Watkins v. Southern Pac. Co. (Or.) 4 L. R. A. 229.

Passenger alighting from moving train presumptively negligent. See note to New York, P. & N. R. Co. v. Coulbourn (Md.) 1 L. R. A. 541.

There was no evidence that the proximate cause of the injury was the rate of speed at which the trains ran.

Brassell v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 241.

Black, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff recovered a verdict for $18,200, and, on the suggestion of the trial court, remitted a part, and accepted a judgment for $10,000, to reverse which the defendant appealed. The defendant, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, submitted a demurrer to the evidence, and asked a like instruction at the close of all of the evidence, both of which were refused. These instructions present the question whether the court should have taken the case from the jury. The facts disclosed by the plaintiff's evidence are, in substance, these: "The defendant's road runs east and west through the City of Kansas. The cars run east on the south, and west on the north, track; and when the trains pass there is a space of not more than eighteen inches between the cars. The cars going east stopped only at the east, and those going west at the west, sidewalk crossings; and then only when persons desired to get on or off. The plaintiff, a young man about twenty years old, boarded an east-bound train, composed of a coach and grip car, intending to go to Holmes Street. He took a seat on the north side of the grip car, near the rear end. Besides end doors, this car had two side doors at the rear end,—one opening out on the north, and the other on the south, side. These doors were open, and there was no gate or other contrivance to prevent persons from going out on the north side. Plaintiff testified that when he reached Holmes Street he pulled a cord, which was attached to an air-whistle, twice, that he heard no signal, and the car did not stop; that he was looking out of the side windows of the car, and then leaned over and looked out of the front-end car door, and did not see any train coming from the east on the north track; that he then got up, went to the rear end of the car, and then stepped out of the north door, and, just as he got upon the ground, a train going west, on the north track hit him and knocked him down. His legs were thrown under the wheels of the cars upon which he had been riding.

stepped off at or within a few feet of the east crossing. He says the train going west was so close to him when he got off that he could not see it. The whistle attached to the cord was in the grip car, and was out of order, so that it gave no signal. The plaintiff's seat in the car was within six or eight feet of the gripman, and the plaintiff did not notify the conductor or gripman where he desired to leave the car. He had been in the habit of going back and forth, to and from his work, by way of the defendant's road, and was familiar with the running of the cars. There were eight trains on the road, and each made ten or twelve daily trips. These trains were running at the rate of a fraction over seven miles per hour, in violation of a city ordinance which limits the rate of speed to six miles per hour.

The evidence tends to show that it was the custom to ring the bells on both trains when and wherever they passed. The gripman of the train on which plaintiff took passage testified in positive terms that the bells on both trains were ringing at and before plaintiff stepped off, but the plaintiff testified, in answer to the question whether he heard any bells: "I don't remember of one on the car I was on. I never heard the bell on the approaching car." Another witness for the plaintiff, being asked if he was accustomed to hear signals, said: "Yes, sir. On that occasion I cannot say whether I noticed any."

The defendant offered evidence to the effect that there were notices in the cars warning persons not to get off while the cars were in motion. The defendant offered other evidence; but, as it does not aid the plaintiff's case, it need not be recited.

The defendant, in running its trains at a rate of speed prohibited by ordinance, was guilty of negligence per se. Krim v. Union R. & Trans. Co. 90 Mo. 814, 7 West. Rep. 144.

Besides that, there is some evidence, though it is very weak, to the effect that the gripman on the west-bound train did not, as was the custom, ring the bell of his car when passing the east bound train, upon which plaintiff was a passenger. We shall assume, for all present purposes, that this bell was not rung. It is argued for the defendant that the speed of the train had no direct agency in causing the injury, but we cannot yield a consent to the proposition. There was sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. The important question is whether the case should have been taken from the jury because of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

While carriers of passengers are held to a very high degree of care, there is a corresponding obligation on the part of the passenger to act with prudence; and, if his negligent act contributes to bringing about the injury, he cannot recover. Ordinarily, as has been said by this court on several occasions, contributory negligence is a question of fact, for the jury; but the power and the duty of the court to direct a verdict in proper cases cannot be questioned. As has been said, if it appears, without any conflict of evidence, from the plaintiff's own case, or from the cross-examination of his witnesses, that he was guilty of negligence him, and guided by what a prudent person would ordinarily do under such circumstances, it seems to us there can be but one conclusion, and that is that the plaintiff was very negligent, to express the result in mild terms. The conclusion of negligence is a necessary and unavoidable result. One cannot thus voluntarily place life and limb in peril, and claim to be free from fault. But for the plaintiff's negligence, he would not have been injured. The court should have sustained the demurrer to the evidence.

The point made that the defendant waived the demurrer to the evidence by putting in its own evidence is not well taken. The demurrer was not only interposed at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, but a like request was made at the close of all the evidence. The defendant, by putting in his evidence, took the chance of aiding the plaintiff's case; but it was not thereby deprived of the right to ask the court to direct a verdict on all of the evidence. We see no reason for remanding this cause, and the judgment is simply reversed.

All concur.

Barclay, J., concurs in reversing the judgment, but is of the opinion that this cause should be remanded.

A motion for rehearing was subsequently filed and on March 23, 1890, the following opinion was delivered:

Per Curiam:

So far as the merits of this case are concerned, we deem it unnecessary to add anything to the opinion heretofore filed. A complaint is made that the court did not give full consideration to the point made in the respondent's brief that exceptions were not properly saved by appellant to the action of the circuit court in refusing certain instructions, among which was one to the effect that, upon the pleadings and evidence, the plaintiff could not recover. This instruction is numbered 10, and is one of thirteen asked by the defendant, but refused by the court. In respect of these refused instructions the bill of exceptions says: "And said instructions Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22, as asked, the court refused, to which refusal of the instructions thus asked the defendant by its counsel then and there excepted at the time." The argument is that there is here but a general exception, and the exception must fail. Authorities are cited from other States which favor the position taken by the respondent, but such is not, and never has been, the rule of practice in this State. Under our Code of Civil Procedure either party may, after the close of the evidence, move the court to give instructions, which are usually prepared by counsel, and must be in writing; and the practice is to number them, as was done in the present case. The refused instructions must be set out in the bill of exceptions, and a formula often used for saving the exceptions is, "Which instructions the court refused, to which refusal of the instructions thus prayed the defendant by his counsel then and there excepted at the time." Whittlesey, Pr. 482.

Such an exception entitles the party to have each refused instruction considered in this court. Whatever may be the ruling of other courts, we must follow the rule which has heretofore prevailed in this court, and we see no reason to depart from it if we were at liberty to do so. This form of saving exceptions is quite as well understood as if the objector had said he excepted to the action of the court in refusing to give said instructions, and each of them. There is nothing in Harrison v. Bartlett, 51 Mo. 170, or St. Joseph v. Ensworth, 65 Mo. 626, which conflicts with what has been said in this case.

One of the grounds assigned for a new trial was "because the court erred in refusing to give instructions Nos. 10 to 22 inclusive, asked by the defendant." This was sufficient.

Again, counsel for the respondent are in error in supposing that defendant waived its objection to the action of the court, in overruling the demurrer to plaintiff's evidence, by putting in its own evidence. When such a demurrer is made and overruled, and the defendant puts in its evidence, this court in reviewing the ruling will do so in the light of all of the evidence. If, upon all the evidence, no matter by whom or when offered, there is a case to go to the jury, we do not reverse, though the demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence should have been given as the case stood when it was interposed. With these qualifications, the demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence will be considered here, though the defendant should offer evidence after it is overruled. McPherson v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 97 Mo. 254.

The motion for rehearing is overruled.

John L. DOUGLASS, Appt.,

v.

MERCHANTS INSURANCE CO., of New York, Resp't.

(118 N. Y. 484.)

1. The secretary of a corporation is chargeable with knowledge of its by- laws which are printed and issued in a book in which his name appears as secretary.

2. A by-law of a corporation providing for the removal of officers by the board of directors at pleasure constitutes part of the contract of employment of a secretary at a designated yearly salary, with no special agreement as to the time of service.

(February 26, 1890.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court,

First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Circuit dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract to pay plaintiff for the rendition of personal services. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. William W. Badger, for appellant: No lawful discharge of plaintiff was shown "upon the 19th day of January, 1885, at the regular meeting for that month," as the 19th could not be "the second Monday" of the month, as required for the alleged "regular meeting" by article 18 of the by-laws.

As plaintiff was paid only to February 1, he was plainly entitled, at least, to the February salary, as damages.

Moody v. Leverick, 4 Daly, 401-409; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362; Everson v. Powers, 89 N. Y. 527; Perry v. Dickerson, 7 Abb. N. C. 470-474, affirmed in 85 N. Y. 350; Goodman v. Pocock, 15 Ad. & El. N. S. 576.

The saving grace of common sense and the ordinary obligations of common honesty require that a faithful servant after twenty-eight years of continuous service at "a yearly salary," should not be summarily and arbitrarily dismissed without cause and without any notice or pay.

1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 544; Story, Ag. § 466; Wood, Mast. and S. § 127, and cases cited.

The just and fair application and intention of the by-law is that it might be applied at the end of any year. A yearly salary "during the pleasure of the board" means that.

Otherwise the by-law is a nullity under the Constitution, as "impairing the obligation of the contract."

A corporation loses its general power of removal, contained in its charter, if it make a special contract.

Williams v. Byrne, 7 Ad. & El. 177; Costigan v. Mohawk & H. R. Co. 2 Denio, 609, 618.

Corporations seeking to enforce by-laws must show their power to pass such by-laws, and bring themselves by proof within that power, and must act at regular meetings or prove notice given of the meetings and also prove express assent to them by their employes.

A contract for services for a yearly salary, if continued into succeeding years without further words, is thereby renewed by the year.

The case is analogous to a contract to the satisfaction of defendants, which cannot be terminated capriciously nor without just cause of honest dissatisfaction.

Brooklyn v. Brooklyn R. Co. 47 N. Y. 479. See also Doll v. Noble, 116 N. Y. 280.

Mr. Francis Lynde Stetson, for respondent:

A continuance in the employment, with the consent of the defendants, after the expiration of the current year, was equivalent to a new hiring upon the same terms.

Vail v. Jersey L. F. Mfg. Co. 82 Barb. 564-567; Huntingdon v. Claffin, 88 N. Y. 182.

The by-law in question being in force when plaintiff's original contract was made, and ever since, and being necessarily within his knowledge, formed part of his contract for the year 1885.

Hunter v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. 26 La. Ann. 13.

The by-law in question, forming part of plaintiff's contract for 1885, accomplished its clear purpose, and reserved to the defendant a right to discharge the plaintiff at any time.

Wood, Mast. and S. p. 274; Smith v. Buffalo Street R. 35 Hun, 204; Tyler v. Ames, 6 Lans. 280; Spring v. Ansonia Clock Co. 24 Hun, 175.

Bradley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff on or about the 1st day of January, 1857, went into the service of the defendant as secretary, at the yearly salary of $1,500; his salary, from time to time changed, was on the 1st of January, 1884, increased to $4,500 a year. He continued as such secretary in the service of the defendant at that annual salary until January 19, 1885, when he was, by the board of directors of the defendant, removed from the office of secretary. He, having been paid up to February 1, brought this action to recover as damages a sum equal to the salary for the residue, or eleven months, of the then current year. This claim is made for the alleged reason that he was in the defendant's service from year to year, and that the defendant could not, without liability to him for damages, discharge him from its service until the end of any year upon which he had entered in such service.

When a party enters into service of another at a stipulated annual compensation or salary, and continues beyond a year, the presumption is that he does so on the same terms. Huntingdon v. Claffin, 88 N. Y. 182; Vail v. Jersey Little Falls Mfg. Co. 82 Barb. 564; Ranck v. Albright, 36 Pa. 367; Taterson v. Suffolk Mfg. Co. 106 Mass. 56.

There is no evidence that the original hiring was for a year, other than in the fact that the plaintiff's salary was annual. The plaintiff, for his evidence in that respect, relied solely upon the admission in the defendant's answer. By the answer it is alleged that a by-law of the defendant, known to the plaintiff, was part of the contract of employment under which he went into and continued in its service. This by-law was adopted and went into effect in 1850, and provided that "the president, vice-president, secretary, surveyor and clerks shall respectively hold their offices during the pleasure of the board of directors, and until the appointment of a successor either permanent or pro tem., and no officer or clerk shall be removed without a concurrence of a majority of the whole board of directors." A new edition of the by-laws, including this one, was printed and issued in 1861, under the direction of a committee, in a book in which appeared the name of the plaintiff as secretary. The plaintiff had or was chargeable with knowledge of this by-law, and it may be assumed that it constituted part of the contract of his employment under which he served as secretary of the defendant. And the main question is, whether the defendant had the right in the manner mentioned in the by-law, without cause, to terminate the plaintiff's service as secretary before the end of the current year, and not subject itself to liability to him for damages as for breach of contract. It is urged on the part of the plaintiff that he was in service under a contract for a year, and that the by-law was not in the way of making such a contract effectual; and when made, the pleasure of removal could be exercised to take effect only at the expiration of the year.

In Soldiers' Orphans Home v. Shaffer, 63 Ill. 248, cited in support of that proposition, the plaintiff's charter provided that the trustees might remove any officer or employé if the interests of the institution required the removal. The plaintiff there was by special contract hired for a year, and the court held that a corporation loses its general power of removal contained in its charter if it makes a special contract. It may be observed that in the case cited the power of removal was not unqualified or to be exercised at pleasure.

And in Martino v. Commerce F. Ins. Co., 15 Jones & S. 520, it was held that the by-laws of the defendant, providing that officers, clerks, etc., should be elected during the pleasure of the board, did not deny to the defendant the power, by special contract, to overcome it or set it aside.

It may be assumed for the purposes of the question that this is within the power of the board which creates the by-laws, and that when it appears that a special contract is made by such board, in terms which indicate an intent of the parties to exclude from it the operation of the by-laws having relation to the right of terminating service, such contract of employment may not be subject to it. The employment of the plaintiff does not come within that proposition. He went into the defendant's service upwards of twenty-eight years before the time of his removal. There does not appear to have been any special contract as to term of service. The compensation was designated as a yearly salary, which the plaintiff in his complaint alleges was payable in monthly or quarterly installments. This would indicate that his service for a year was contemplated, and the terms would presumptively be the same each subsequent year, except so far as modified by the parties, and without some reserved right of termination it may be assumed that his service was not terminable without cause until the end of any current year. Williams v. Byrne, 7 Ad. & El. 177.

But here was no special contract which indicated any purpose to abridge the right of removal at pleasure given by the by-law which entered into the contract of employment, and subject to which the plaintiff went into and continued in the defendant's service until this reserved power was exercised. Nor is it seen that this right of removal was qualified in respect to the time of its exercise. Our attention is called to but very little judicial authority upon the question.

In Hunter v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 26 La. Ann. 18, the plaintiff was employed by the defendant for one year from in February, 1869, which he served, and on the expiration of that term he was employed by the defendant for another year. He was discharged in April of the second year without cause, and brought his action to recover damages for alleged breach of the contract. There was a by-law of the defendant, in terms, giving the right to remove its officers at pleasure. It was there held that the officer so employed was presumed to have known of the existence of the by-law, that it was part of the contract, and the law governing their rights in that respect, and "therefore the plaintiff knew the precarious tenure of his position" and was not entitled to recover.

In Smith v. Buffalo Street R. Co., 35 Hun. 204, the question as to the right to discharge an employé within the term arose upon a provision in the contract that the employer might discharge him "at any time." It was held that the right to discharge him was unqualified. In the present case the power of removal at any time must be deemed to have been reserved in the contract of employment. And it seems to have been properly exercised. It was done at a meeting of the board of directors by concurrence of a majority of the whole board, and a secretary pro tem. was then appointed, and he was made permanent secretary on the tenth of the following month. No question was made on the trial as to the regularity of the meeting of the board at which the removal was made. Nor does there appear in the record any support for the contention that it was not a meeting at which the removal may have been accomplished.

All concur.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Clarence M. BURTON, Relator,

Thomas P. TUIE, Treasurer of the City of Detroit.

(....Mich....)

Stub receipt books in a city treasurer's office, which contain the record of canceled certificates of tax sales, the list of lots redeemed from sales for special city taxes and also the list of lots sold to the city for delinquent taxes and afterwards assigned to individuals, are public records within the meaning of Pub. Acts 1889, No. 205, which provides for the inspection of such records, notwithstanding the fact that all data contained in such books, are at the convenience of the treasurer, to be entered in record books which are accessible to the public.

(April 18, 1890.)

PETITION for rule to show cause why defendant should not be punished for contempt for refusing to comply with the direction contained in a writ of mandamus commanding him to permit relator to inspect certain public records. Judgment against defendant.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. Henry A. Chaney for relator.

Mr. John W. McGrath for respondent.

Morse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent is City Treasurer of Detroit. The relator is engaged in the abstract business in said city. We held, upon application of the relator for mandamus (see Burton v. Tuite, ante, 78) that certain records in said treasurer's office were public records, and that relator had a right to examine them, and to make memoranda or transcripts therefrom under Act No. 205, Pub. Acts 1889,* subject to such proper and reasonable regulations as the treasurer might make consistent with the public use of such records. Our order in the case, as made and entered in the journal on the 8th day of January, 1890, commanded the said Tuite not only to allow the relator to inspect and examine the particular records involved in that case, but also to generally furnish to him and his subordinates reasonable and proper facilities for the inspection and examination of the records and files in his office, and for making memoranda and transcripts therefrom in compliance with said above-named Act of the Legislature. In the opinion, as well as in the order, of this court we meant to so express our views and commands as that there should be no mistake or misunderstanding as to the rights and duties of the respective parties to this controversy. But we are now called upon to enforce our order. January 18, 1890, a petition was filed in this court by the relator showing the proper service of our writ of peremptory mandamus upon respondent, and setting forth that, notwithstanding our order and command therein contained, the respondent had since said service refused to allow relator to have access to or look at certain other public records in said office of the City Treasurer, to wit: One book containing the record of the certificates of tax-sales that have been canceled; one book containing a list of such lots as have been sold to the City of Detroit, or to individuals, for special city taxes, and have been from time to time redeemed; and a book containing a list of such lots or parcels of land in the City of Detroit as have been heretofore sold to said city for delinquent city taxes, said sales being afterwards assigned by the city to individuals. Upon this petition, January 15, 1890, we issued an order to the said Thomas P. Tuite to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt and disobedience of the said writ of mandamus of date January 8, 1890.

Respondent answered this order on the 28th day of January, 1890, denying that the above-named books were public records, or that the relator had any right to examine them under the Statute, or our decision and order above stated. The books in question were denominated by the respondent as "Stub Receipt Books," and it was insisted in said answer that the same were not public records, but mere memoranda for the convenience of the office, and that all the data contained therein is entered in the "Record Books," which are accessible to relator. It was, however, admitted upon the argument that the transferring of the data upon these stub books to the record books might be delayed for days or weeks, at the pleasure of the respondent.

After hearing both parties by counsel upon the petition and answer, we directed certain interrogatories to be served upon the respondent, to be answered by him under oath, and that other proofs be taken touching the truth of the matters involved in the petition and answer, as well as the nature and character and use of said books. The answers to said interrogatories and other testimony taken have been returned to us. We do not intend to again go into the discussion of the questions that were settled by us in the first opinion filed in this case. We are satisfied that the books referred to, by whatever name they are called, are public records in the treasurer's office in the full sense of the Statute, and, under the opinion above referred to, that the respondent is guilty of contempt and disobedience of the order of this court in refusing to the relator the privilege of examining them, and making transcripts thereof. We think, however, that this disobedience has occurred, not so much from a willful disregard of our command, as from bad advice. Under these circumstances, we are not disposed to impose a heavy penalty, but we hope that our orders will hereafter be strictly complied with, and without delay or attempted evasion, as the fine in this case will not stand as a precedent in any future case of disobedience of the mandates or decrees of this court. An order will be entered adjudging the said Thomas P. Tuite guilty of contempt and disobedience of our aforesaid writ of mandamus, and that he pay to the people of the State of Michigan a fine of $25, with the costs of this proceeding to be taxed by the clerk of this court, such payment to be made to said clerk within ten days after a copy of such order shall be served upon him.

The other Justices concurred.

*The material portion of that Act is as follows:

"The officers having the custody of any county, city or town records in this State shall furnish proper and reasonable facilities for the inspection and examination of the records and files in their respective offices, and for making memoranda or transcripts therefrom, during the usual business hours, to all persons having occasion to make examination of them for any lawful purpose."

2. A bank is put upon inquiry as to the right of an executrix to transfer stock in the bank to herself as an individual by a proposal to make such transfer as security for her indorsement of the note of another; and if the bank relies upon the statement of the maker of the note as to her ownership, instead of consulting the will, and the transfer by the executrix was unauthorized, it can claim no lien as security for such indorsement against those who are entitled to the stock under the will.
3. In cases of fraud the Statute of Limitations begins to run, in equity, not at the time the fraud is perpetrated, but from the time of its discovery.

Mr. Joseph C. Ely, for complainants:

The defendant Bank was charged with notice that this transfer was improperly made and therefore takes no lien other than that on Mrs. Peck's beneficial interest in said sixteen shares of stock under the will of Allen O. Peck, if it has any claim thereon.

Where a proper record of assessment proceedings is open for inspection, mere passive silence does not amount to such a concealment as will take the case out of the operation of the Statute. Churchman v. Indianapolis, 3 West. Rep. 917, 110 Ind. 259.

That a bankrupt omitted to mention life policies in his schedules in bankruptcy, and that neither he nor his administrator informed the assignee of them, but took no means to conceal them, does not establish fraudulent concealment of them so as to prevent the running of the Statute of Limitations. *Avery v. Although concealment of fraud has been held ground for suspending the Statute of Limitations, yet the evasion of the service of process is not fraud in the legal sense of the term, and is no valid answer to the statutory bar. Amy v. Watertown, 180 U. S. 320 (32 L. ed. 958).

In New York the concealment of a cause of action ex contractu does not, in courts of law, interrupt or delay the running of the Statute of Limitations as a bar to the action. Andrew v. Bedford, 98 U. S. 225 (25 L. ed. 158).

An allegation that the defendant "tried to conceal, and did conceal," from the plaintiff the facts constituting the cause of action, does not bring the case within the rule, where there is no allegation that the concealment was effected by any artifice or false statement, or where the ultimate fact of fraud is not pleaded. Brunson v. Ballou, 70 Iowa, 84.

Exception to the rule.

The rule that in cases of fraud the Statute of Limitations begins to run only from the discovery of the fraud, does not apply where the party affected by the fraud might, with ordinary diligence, have discovered it. Vigus v. O'Bannon, 6 West. Rep. 219, 118 Ill. 834.

But the failure of such diligence may be excused where there exists some relation of trust and confidence between the party committing the fraud and the party affected by it, rendering it a duty of the former to disclose to the latter the true state of the transaction. Atlantic Nat. Calcutt, 28 Miss. 432; Biselow, Fr. 445; Way v. Cutting, 20 N. H. 137; Loesch v. Pickett, 36 Kan. 216.

Where complainant's claim is based upon a fraud which defendant has concealed, the statutory period will not commence until the fraud is discovered, or until it would have been discovered had reasonable diligence been exercised. *Somerset Co. There must be reasonable diligence; and the means of knowledge are the same thing in effect as knowledge itself; and the circumstances of the discovery must be fully stated and proved; and the delay which has occurred must be shown to be consistent with the requisite diligence. *Putnam v. If it appears that the party has knowledge or information of facts sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry, and that he wholly neglects to make any inquiry, or, having begun, fails to prosecute it in a reasonable manner, the inference of actual notice is necessary and absolute. *Spofford v. ica. The purpose of the bill is to determine the rights of the complainants and of the respondent Bank to sixteen shares in the capital stock of the latter. The cause was heard on bill, answers and an agreed statement of facts. The case, as it appeared upon the hearing, was as follows, viz: Allen O. Peck died September 15, 1871, leaving a last will and testament, the residuary clause of which was as follows, to wit: "I give, devise and bequeath all the residue and remainder of my estate, of all kinds, to my children, share and share alike, to have and to hold the same to them, and their respective heirs, subject, however, to the following provision for my wife, Mary Elizabeth Peck, in lieu of her dower in my said estate: My said wife may use, occupy and enjoy such parts of my estate as she may at any time elect, for the residence of herself and my children, and the income of all other parts of my said estate for the use and benefit of herself and my children during her life, and until the day of her marriage; but from the day of her marriage, and for the remainder of her life, she may have the use and income of one half of my estate, including such part thereof as she may select for her residence, and the household furniture."

This will was duly proved in the Municipal Court in Providence, and the respondent, Mary E. Peck, named therein as executrix, accepted the trust, qualified herself to act, administered the estate, and on September 8, 1874, having completed the administration, filed a statement in said municipal court, showing that there remained of said estate certain property, among which were the sixteen shares in suit. Being unused to business, she relied in her business transactions on the advice and direction of her brother, the late Henry C. Whitaker, who, however, took advantage of her inexperience for his own ends, and misled and deceived her, and thereby obtained her indorsement on various promissory notes of which he was the maker, the proceeds of which he applied to his own use. He also obtained from her a blank power of attorney signed by her as executrix, by which, on his statement that said sixteen shares belonged to her, he, on July 9, 1880, procured the transfer of said shares to her individually, and also the discount by the respondent Bank of his note, bearing her indorsement, the proceeds of which were, at his request, placed to his credit, and paid out on his checks. This note was renewed from time to time, until Whitaker died, in 1887, when the true state of affairs came to light. Neither the respondent Mary E. Peck, nor the estate of Allen O. Peck, received any part of the proceeds of said note. The respondent Bank, in discounting the original note, and in the renewals thereof, relied for security on the indorsement of said Mary E. Peck, and her supposed ownership of said shares, and the lien

A party must, for the purposes of the Statute of Limitations, be held to have knowledge, if he had the means of knowledge and the circumstances were such as to charge him on inquiry. Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167.

When a party is put upon an inquiry, and the circumstances are such that the inquiry if duly prosecuted must necessarily lead to knowledge of the prior adverse title, the presumption that he obtained the knowledge is conclusive. See Brice v. Brice, 5 Barb. 533; Hanley v. Morse, 32 Me. 237; McLaughlin v. Shepherd, Id. 143; Webster v. Maddox, 6 Me. 256; Kent v. Plummer, 7 Me. 464; Jaques v. Weeks, supra; Kerr v. If a party steadily avoids all inquiry and omits all examination, he will be chargeable with all the 7 L. R. A.

consequences of positive notice, actual fraud or willful neglect; for whatever is sufficient to put a party upon inquiry is in equity held to be good notice. Kellogg v. Smith, 36 N. Y. 24; Brown v. Blydenburgh, 7 N. Y. 141.

Notice which puts the party upon inquiry is sufficient even under the Registry Act. Williamson v. Brown, 15 N. Y. 353.

Where the source of information has been pointed out, any ignorance in this respect will be considered voluntary. Livingston v. Wells, 8 S. C. 350; McLure v. Ashby, 7 Rich. Eq. 444; Maxwell v. Kennedy, 49 U. S. 8 How. 220 (12 L. ed. 1055); 2 Story, Eq. § 1521.

Whether a second indorsee received notes after their maturity, or out of the ordinary course of business, or under circumstances which authorize an inference that he had knowledge of fraud in the first indorsement, are questions for the jury, and if they so find he cannot recover. Smith v. Strader, 45 U. S. 4 How. 404 (11 L. ed. 1081).

A judgment creditor is chargeable with notice of a deed from his debtor to the wife of the latter from the time of its recording. Hawley v. Page, 77 Iowa, 239.

Where a deed showing fraud on its face has been on record for thirty years, it cannot be held that the Statute of Limitations did not run because the fraud was not discovered. Teall v. Slaven, 40 Fed. Rep. 774.

Where the party interested had notice in his lifetime of all the facts which constituted the ground of fraud alleged in the bill, his heirs are not entitled to the benefit of an exemption from the bar of the Statute on the ground of recent discovery of the fraud. Clarke v. Johnston, 35 U. S. 15 Wall. 493 (21 L. ed. 904).

The courts cannot create an exception to the operation of the Statute of Limitations, not made by the Statute itself, where the party designedly eludes the service of process. Amy v. Watertown, 130 U. S. 320 (32 L. ed. 953).

The rule of diligence to entitle the party de-thereon given by the following provision of its charter, in article 4: "No person indebted to the Bank shall be allowed to sell or transfer his or her stock without the consent of the directors; and this, whether indebted as principal, surety or indorser, and whether the debt has become due or not. The stock of each stockholder shall be liable, and may be sold at auction by order of the president and directors, for the payment of any debt due from such stockholder to the Bank, or so much thereof as may be necessary on default of payment thereof when due; but sixty days' previous notice shall be given of such sale in some one of the newspapers printed in the City of Providence." The respondent Bank had no knowledge of any misleading advice of said Whitaker to said Mary E. Peck, nor of any imposition practiced on her by him; nor had the complainants any knowledge of the transactions whereby said Bank claims its lien until after the death of said Whitaker. All of the dividends upon said shares since July 9, 1880, except one, have been drawn by the complainant Mary T. Peck for, and as agent of, said Mary E. Peck. After the death of said Whitaker, suits were brought against said Mary E. Peck, and attachments were placed upon her property, to dissolve which she made a general assignment, under Pub. Stat. R. I., chap. 237, § 12, to the respondent Smith, for the benefit of her creditors.

In Perk v. Smith, 6 New R. I. —, we held that, under said will above quoted, said life estate in the residuary was not wholly, free from trust, and that her beneficiary was assignable. The complaint that the respondent Bank was notified that the transfer of said E. Peck as executrix to her was improper, and therefore thereon, or, at most, acquired only to the extent of her interest. The respondent Bank was not chargeable. It argues, as it there was no actual notice, the transfer was improper, there was no notice of such impropriety, in principle, it was bound to follow its will. It contends that it was that an executor or administrator has power of disposal over the property of his testator or intestate, and that he is followed by creditors of the testator or intestate; that he is always sufficient evidence of the transfer of stock, because a sale in the line of duty of an executor or administrator to dispose of the property to pay debts, and it therefore is justly and safely permit a transfer of stock by an executor without looking for his frauded to the rescission of a contract is well established; but want of diligence alone in discovering the fraud, when the rights of third parties have not intervened, will not affect the right to rescind. Duffield v. Barnum W. & L. Works, 7 West. Rep. 610, 44 Mich. 238.

Bill for relief, against concealed fraud.

The right to rescind a contract for fraud must be exercised immediately upon its discovery. Strong v. Strong, 3 Cent. Rep. 49, 102 N. Y. 69.

No relief can be had against a fraudulent sale by a trustee for the benefit of creditors, unless the bill is brought without unreasonable delay. Martin v. Globe Ins. Co. 4 West. Rep. 127, 116 Ill. 654.

Laches will defeat setting aside a conveyance, unless it is shown by clearest and most satisfactory evidence that it was fraudulent. Ibid.

Where a party injured by fraud is in ignorance of its existence, the duty to commence proceedings arises only upon discovery; and mere submission to an injury, after the act inflicting it is completed, cannot generally and in the absence of other circumstances take away a right of action, unless such acquiescence continues for the period limited by the Statute for the enforcement of such right. Kilbourn v. Sunderland, 180 U. S. 505, 32 L. ed. 1005.

It was necessary to allege in the bill such facts as were required to repel the presumption arising from the lapse of time; and where the fraud was committed more than six years before suit brought it was necessary to allege and prove that the discovery of it was within six years. Erickson v. Quinn, 3 Iana. 306; Moore v. Greene, 60 U. R. 19 How. 69, 15 L. ed. 533; Fleld v. Wilson, 6 B. Mon. 479; Carr v. Hilton, 1 Curt. 360; Stearns v. Page, 48 U. A bill filed for relief on the ground of fraud, which shows on its face that the fraud was committed more than six years before the filing of the bill, should not merely state in anticipation of the defense of the Statute of Limitations that the fraud was discovered within six years, but should state that it was discovered sooner. Parker v. K...

Within two years after discovery.

A cause of action for relief from fraud is barred by the two years' statute in Civ. Code, § 18, subd. 3, if the fraud was committed more than two years before the discovery. Losch v. Pickett, 38 Ill.

The Michigan Statute is not applicable where the fraud was entirely neglected to search for the fraud, and the statute was to be found, and the statute threw no obstacle in the way. Purdon v. Seligman (Mich.) No.

Within three years.

Under the Statute (Gen. Stat. § 18, subd. 3), relief on the ground of fraud is barred by three years after the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud. Bohm, 9 Colo. 100.

Under the California Code an action for relief from fraudulent misappropriation of property is not barred until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud. Moyle v. L...

The liability of a stockholder for the fraud of a corporation is not barred by the statute of limitations, "within the meaning of the law," within the meaning of the statute, and must be sued upon after the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud. Moore v. B...

A suit attacking a sale of property obtained by fraud is not barred by the statute of limitations when brought within three years after the discovery of the fraud, and less than eighteen months after the execution of the sheriff's deed. Great Western Lumber Co. v. Woodmas of Alston Min. Co. 12

In Florida, an action brought on the ground of fraud, eight years after the discovery of the fraud by plaintiff, is barred.

the proposed transfer is apparently in the ordinary course of administration, for the purpose of raising money to pay the testator's debts, or the legacies given by the will. In such a case, the officer of the corporation whose duty it is to supervise the transfer can have no means of ascertaining whether or not the transfer is for the purposes named, except by inquiry of the executor himself, since, generally, no one else would have knowledge of the condition of the estate. If, however, the circumstances attending the proposed transfer show that it is not in the ordinary course of administration, it becomes the duty of the transfer officer, before permitting it, to inquire into the authority of the executor to make it. Corporations stand upon the footing of trustees, in relation to their stockholders, for the protection of their interests. Being custodians of the primary evidence of title to the stock, they are held to the exercise of reasonable care and diligence in its preservation. Their safety therefore requires them, before permitting a transfer, to be satisfied of the authority of the person to make it. Hence they are entitled to require the production of satisfactory evidence of such authority, and though, generally, the possession of the legal title is sufficient evidence thereof, it is not always so, since the real equitable ownership may be in some other than the holder of the legal right; and this is especially true of an executor, for it not infrequently may work a serious wrong to the equitable owner; and if the corporation allows it to be made with notice of the want of authority, or if put upon inquiry, without proper investigation into the authority, it becomes a party to the wrong. In equity, whatever puts upon inquiry is notice of what inquiry would disclose. Bayard v. Farmers & M. Bank, 52 Pa. 282.

In Lowry v. Commercial & F. Bank, 8 Am. L. J. N. S. 111, it was held that where bank stock had been bequeathed to an executor in trust to pay the dividends to certain persons and the executor had transferred it to one who made advances on it for the use of the executor, the bank which issued the certificate, having notice that the stock belonged originally to the testator, was bound to look to the title of the executor under the will before it permitted the transfer. In this case the transfer was made by the executor as such, and there was no proof of any actual notice to the bank that other persons were equitably interested in the stock, or that the executor was abusing his trust, and applying the stock to his own use. But Taney, Ch. J., held that the bank was bound to take notice of the will when the transfer was proposed by one of the executors, that it was negligence in the bank not to examine it; and that, if it was ignorant of its contents and of the specific bequest of the stock, it was its own fault, that it must be dealt with as if it had possessed actual knowledge that the stock in question was specifically bequeathed, and was not, by the will, to be transferred, or in any manner disposed of, by the executor during the lifetime of the complainant. He then proceeded to show that while it might have been sold, if necessary, for the payment of debts, there was enough to indicate to the Bank that it was not needed for such a use. The Bank was therefore held liable as a party to the fraud of the executor. And see also Stewart v. Firemen's Ins. Co. 53 Md. 564; Covington v. Anderson, 16 Lea, 810; Caultkins v. Memphis Gaslight Co. 85 Tenn. (1 Pickle) 693; Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. Jr. 152.

The transfer in the present case was not apparently in the ordinary course of administration. It was made nearly nine years after the testator's death, and nearly six years after the period limited by the law of this State for the settlement of estates had elapsed. Moreover, it was made, not to another person, for the purpose of raising money for the benefit of the testator's estate, but to the executrix individually, for the purpose of affording security for her indorsement on the note of Whitaker. These circumstances of the proposed transfer were enough to have put the transfer officer of the Bank upon inquiry. The fact that the proposed transfer was to be made by an executrix was notice of the existence of the will. An examination of the will, the production of which, or a certified copy of the record of which, he could have required, would have disclosed the true state of the title to the stock. It was negligence in him to rely upon the statement of Whitaker as to the ownership, instead of consulting the will, and if loss is to result it should be borne by the Bank, whose agent he was, and not by the complainants.

The respondent Bank further contends that the complainants are bound by the Statute of Limitations from impeaching the good faith of the transaction. This defense cannot avail. The transfer of the stock, in the circumstances recited, was, in contemplation of equity, a fraud upon the rights of the complainants. In equity, in cases of fraud, the Statute of Limitations begins to run, not at the time the fraud is perpetrated, but from the time of its discovery. Parham v. McCravy, 6 Rich. Eq. 140; Meador v. Norton, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 442 [20 L. ed. 184]; Evans v. Bacon, 99 Mass. 218; Bertine v. Varian, 1 Edw. Ch. 848; Henry County v. Winnebago Swamp Drainage Co. 52 Ill. 299.

The complainants had no knowledge of the transaction in question until 1887, and the bill was filed January 17, 1888. We think the complainants are entitled to a decree that the respondent Bank has a lien upon said sixteen shares, only to the extent of the beneficial interest of the said Mary E. Peck therein. What this interest is was discussed to some extent in the complainant's brief, but was not considered in that of the respondent Bank. We are not prepared to pass upon that matter without further argument.

The extent of the interest of Mary E. Peck was afterwards brought on for argument, and the court, after consideration of the matter, handed down the following rescript:

"The court think that the interest of Mary E. Peck in the sixteen shares, in so far as it is separable from that of her daughter, extends to only one fifth of the income thereof during her life, and that the Bank is entitled to a lien thereon to that extent, but only to that extent, for the payment of its claim against her."

The right of the person elected to an office may be contested by any elector of the district or county. Dalton v. State, 1 West. Rep. 784, 43 Ohio St. 652.

The provisions of the Election Law entitled "Contesting Elections" are cumulative, and are not an exclusive remedy. State v. Frazier (Neb.) Jan. 7, 1890.

A proceeding to contest an election affords an adequate remedy in cases of the fraudulent acts of election officers. Dalton v. State, 1 West. Rep. 778, 43 Ohio St. 652.

and has never been the practice in this court, to enter anew into the investigation of issues of fact which have been tried in a law case by a circuit judge upon conflicting testimony delivered ~~or~~ taken by the witnesses in his presence. When a jury is waived by the parties, and the issues of fact are tried before the judge, his findings of fact are as conclusive on appeal as the verdict of a jury; and when the law makes the judge the trier of facts in cases to which the constitutional right of trial by jury does not extend, the same presumption attends his findings. Corley v. State, 50 Ark. 303.

The reasons which sustain the rule in the one case exist as well in the other. The statute has not established a different rule for election cases, and there is nothing in the policy of the law to warrant the courts in doing so. On the contrary, the rule was followed in Powell v. Hulman, 50 Ark. 85, and in Wheat v. Smith, Id. 264; and in Gowan v. Jackson, 53 Ark. 558, and Patton v. Chiles, 41 Ark. 111, where there was no special finding of facts, in the nature of a special verdict, the cause was remanded to the circuit court for a new trial, whereas, if the court were at liberty to review the facts as in an equity case, judgment would have been entered here in accordance with this court's conclusion upon the facts. But while we will not enter upon an investigation to ascertain where the weight or the preponderance of the testimony lies, it is our province to determine whether a given finding or verdict has testimony to sustain it; and where there is no conflict in the evidence, or the facts are specially found, the conclusion of law or the judgment to be deduced therefrom is purely a question of law to be finally determined by this court.

In the case at bar the court found generally for the contestant, refused the contestant's request to find that the evidence of illegal practices was not sufficient to warrant the exclusion of the vote of any precinct, and made a special finding of facts. The trial consumed many days and the record is voluminous. The evidence which counsel have pointed out as material is in hopeless conflict upon most of the issues, but these conflicts have been determined by the trial judge in favor of the contestant, and that determination is, as we have seen, final. The questions are, What conclusions of fact could the trial court legally draw from the evidence? and, What judgment does the law pronounce upon those conclusions?

It may be said that a preponderance of the testimony shows that at the outset of the campaign many of the negro electors of Pulaski County evinced a desire to vote for favored candidates on the Democratic ticket—the contestee among the number; that as the election approached a bitter feeling was engendered against them among the people of their own race on that account; that it grew to such an extent that negro adherents of the Democratic ticket were silenced in public meetings, stoned in political parade, and cut off, in a great measure, from the society and sympathy of their race, or threatened with that fate if they persisted in so doing. There was testimony tending to show that ministers of the Gospel

Cockrill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Jones and Glidewell were opposing candidates for the office of County Treasurer of Pulaski County at the general election in 1878. Glidewell received the certificate of election, and entered upon the duties of the office. Jones thereupon instituted this contest for the office. In the circuit court where the cause was heard on appeal from the county court, the judge found that Jones had received a majority of the votes cast at the election, but refused to award him the office upon the ground that the evidence showed that his adherents had been guilty of illegal practices of such character, and on wide spread, as to avoid the election. Jones contends that the finding is not warranted by the testimony, and asks us to review the secure, is attacked by all the adjudicated cases on the subject. "The object of such Acts," says the Supreme Court of Indiana, "is evidently to protect the elector from the undue influence and control of others and secure to him entire freedom of opinion in the exercise of the elective franchise, by enabling him to cast his vote in such manner as to prevent others, who from their particular relations to him, might, by intimidation or otherwise, seek to control his vote, from being able to determine from the color of the ticket or some distinguishing mark thereon, the party or person for whom he voted." Drubner v. State, 29 Ind. 309.

"The purpose is," says the Supreme Court of Minnesota, "to protect the secrecy of the ballot, so as to secure the voter against intimidation, and not to compel men to vote the 'straight ticket.'" Quinn v. Markes, 37 Minn. 439.

These views of the object of the vote by ballot are mentioned by all the authorities. McCreary, Elections, § 454 et seq.; Williams v. Stein, 35 Ind. 89, Brinkin v. Cleary, 26 Minn. 107; People v. Cicott, 10 Mich. 308, 97 Am. Dec. 141, and note; Atty. Gen. v. Detroit, 35 Mich. 313; Woodward v. Barrows, L. R. 10 C. P. 733.

So jealously have the courts guarded the right when it is secured by the Constitution, that Acts of Legislatures requiring election officers to number the ballots as they are cast, have been held to be void because they afford the opportunity of raising the veil of secrecy which the Constitution guarantees to the voter. Williams v. Stein and Brinkin v. Cleary, supra. See Hodge v. Linn, 100 Ill. 307.

The framers of our Constitution saw proper to remove this difficulty, by providing in that instrument for the numbering of ballots, but the officers to whom the arrangement of secrecy is intrusted by the Constitution can divulge it only by the violation of a trust which the law declares a crime. As further evidence of the regard the law entertains for the secrecy of the ballot, a voter cannot be compelled to disclose for whom he voted by a court of justice. Dixon v. Orr, 49 Ark. 200.

And this results, not from any direct prohibition found in the Statute or Constitution, but because the privilege of secrecy is inherent in the constitutional guaranty of a vote by ballot.

If, then, the right is so carefully guarded against infringement by the Legislature, and public policy prohibits the enforced disclosure by the voter to the courts of the contents of his ballot, can it be held that the adherents of a candidate may, by an enforced system of open voting at the polls, which the voter cannot escape without incurring their odium, defeat the fundamental object of the ballot system? Such a view, says Judge Cooley, "would establish this remarkable anomaly, that while the law, from motives of public policy, establishes the secret ballot with a view to conceal the elector's action, it at the same time encourages a system of espionage, by means of which the veil of secrecy may be penetrated and the voter's action disclosed to the public." The practice is certainly inconsistent with the secrecy of the ballot—the question is, Does it avoid the election?

fering with the system, and blinds the electors themselves to its observance. Neither can peace with it. The elective franchise is an unrestricted license—it can be exercised in accordance with the law. An election by open vote voting, although it should record the will of the people, would not be a constitutional election. It must be conducted in accordance with the principles of an election by ballot, or it is no election. But an election by ballot means at least the privilege of casting the elective franchise in secret, and an open vote practiced at the polls which makes it impossible to believe that the electors have been deceived by the deprivation of secrecy from seeing a candidate whom a majority prefer, is an illegal annulment of the will of the majority and not a lawful election of the unpreferring candidate, whatever the ballots actually may purport to show. The secrecy of the ballot is a personal privilege which the voter may waive if it is his wish, but of which cannot be lawfully deprived; and any practice at a poll which defeats the freedom of choice of enough electors to render the result conclusive, destroys the freedom of the election. Patten v. Coates, supra.

The use of different colored ballots by political party managers are enabled to distinguish ballots in the hand of the voter, though opposed, as Judge Cooley points out, to the provisions of the Constitution, does not, in the absence of a statute prohibiting it, avoid the election. (Cooley, Const. L. Im. 605), because it is the voter's privilege to change the ticket as he desires, so that the exterior shall not in fact claim its contents. But when the voter is forced to the alternative of opening his ticket in view of clamorous bystanders at the polls, or prove that its contents are what its color claims, or else be subjected to the ignominy which the previous threats of his race hold out to him he will meet, he cannot be said to exercise the privilege but surrenders it under coercion.

This systematic plan of coercion which the circuit judge found was prevalent before the election, although it is inimical to the efficient administration of a republican form of government, does not, as we have seen, avoid the result, because the voters, if undisturbed at the polls, may exercise their freedom of choice without detection, and consequently without incurring the penalty attached to indecisive voting, but when there is no escape from incurring the penalty save by exposure of the ballot, the election ceases to be free within the meaning of the constitutional guaranty.

It is not necessary to show that a man was actually prevented from voting, or that he was against their wishes by reason of the pressure. When the wrong is flagrant and its influence diffusive, it is sufficient that it renders the result doubtful. There is no division, I think, in the authorities upon that proposition. It was said by the court in Patten v. Coates, 97 Ark. 111: "There is a distinction, in the nature of things, between particular illegal votes which may be proven and exactly computed, and the effects of fraudulent coercion, and the effects of fraudulent coercion."

of the case at the special term, the time for the further examination of witnesses must be limited to one week. "Counsel for the contestant," says the record, "expressed a decided opinion for having the case decided during the proposed adjourned session, and remarked that he thought they could finish their testimony in two days after the contestee closed, if, he added, the other side does not take up too much of the time in cross-examination." The court thereupon gave notice that the contestee would be allowed four days and the contestant two in the first week of the adjourned term. When the time arrived the contestee was accorded his allotted time, and on the second day of the contestant's allotted time, which was Saturday, the court adjourned at 1 P. M.; but to compensate him for the loss of the remaining judicial hours of that day, gave him the entire day until 6:30 P. M. on the following Monday, when in accordance with his previous notice, the trial was closed.

This course of conduct does not indicate abuse of judicial discretion in the regulation of the trial. The time was limited in accordance is no effort to show that unnecessary time was consumed in the cross-examination of his witnesses, and no surprise by the court's action is claimed. Moreover, it is not shown to what points the testimony of the witnesses was to be directed. Whether it was material or would have tended to affect the result, counsel have made no effort to establish.

Limiting the time for the examination of witnesses, the number of witnesses to a given point, stopping repetitions and irrelevant examinations, are matters necessarily confided to a trial judge. Business could not well be dispatched without it. Thompson, Trials, §§ 852, 853.

It is only when the complaining party shows that this discretion has been abused that we interfere. It is not shown in this case. Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Pryor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1878, Samuel McCullough died in the County of Fayette, Harriet McCullough, survived him, and he devised his estate in the "To my most precious and I give during her life all personal, whether in possession with full and ample authority whole of it as she pleases. If she not have previously in disposition of all remaining, her, I desire that such remainder be distributed as herein directed to my niece, Mrs. Mary, of India house and lot on High Street, etc." The testator made other special devises, executors, within two months of his death, to sell and dispose of the real estate he had left undisposed of by him to distribute the proceeds as he had no children, and his wife intestate in the year 1887, the property devised to her in controversy is between the will of the husband and the wife, each claiming the property by the wife. The person McCullough filed his petition for the devisees of the one and the other, in which he claimed the property as passed by the testator. The heirs of Harriet wife, filed an answer, in which the estate passed under the testator and Distribution to the heirs of the testator below adjudged this answer that on the death of the testator the real estate in Fayette County to her heirs in fee, and the heirs and distributees; in the will of the husband expended," to his children, gives her only a life estate in the real property. Cox v. Sims, 125 Pa. 522.

Under the following provisions in a will: "I give my wife all my property, real and personal, to hold and enjoy during her life, in trust for the equal benefit of herself and my son and daughter; I give to my said children, in equal parts, and their heirs, all my estate that shall remain after the death of their mother;" it was held that the wife took a life estate only. Thaw v. Ritchie (D. C.) 1 Cent. Rep. 833, 4 Mackey, 347.

A gift by will of personal property to a widow, "so long as she may live," gives her only a life estate therein. Re Foster's Will, 76 Iowa, 364.

Estates for life determinable upon events happening.

An estate for life may be determinable upon the happening of some event, as marriage or cessation of coverture, or residence on the premises by the grantee. 1 Inst. 43.

A will devising to the wife of the testator all his estate during life, "and to dispose of discretely, according to her own free will and judgment, providing that she never marries a second time," in which event the property to go to the testator's children, gives to the widow a life estate only, and the power of disposal is limited to that estate. Douglas v. Sharp (Ark.) Oct. 19, 1890.

In a devise of land in fee simple to the testator's son's widow while she remained such she takes only the life estate, and cannot make a good deed in fee simple. McGuire's App. (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 649. 7 L. R. A.

A will, one paragraph of which gave the wife of the testator the control and desire of the property managed by her as she may provide if she marries again, and the other desired "that she may give security for the property remaining on hand, for the purpose of her children; and, should she at her death I desire that all the property be divided equally" among the wife being appointed executrix, gives to her an estate in fee simple, with power of sale, and she remains a widow. Best v. Best.

A will giving the wife of the testator the property to keep for her own use as long as she may live, and giving her power, "and to dispose of discretely, according to her own free will and judgment, providing that she never marries a second time," in which event the property to go to the testator's children, gives to the widow a life estate only, and the power of disposal is limited to that estate. Douglas v. Sharp (Ark.) Oct. 19, 1890.

A devise to testator's wife of real property, to remain here, and to dispose of it as shall seem to her proper, so long as she shall remain unmarried, the express condition that, if she marries, that part of the estate given to her may remain, shall go to other persons only what may remain of the real or personal estate; and a deed ex-only, with the power to dispose of it if she saw proper during her life, or at her death by last will and testament, and, not having exercised that power, the estate left passed by the will; that, while the life estate might have been enlarged by the exercise of the power of disposition, the wife, having failed to exercise that power, left the estate to pass as the testator directed it should. The power of absolute disposition carries with it, nothing else appearing, the absolute property in that which is to be disposed of, but there may be such an intention arising from the language used as will limit the power or confine its exercise to the life of the first taker.

It is manifest from the provisions of this will the testator desired that his wife should use and dispose of this estate during her life as she wished, and to make a testamentary disposition of it if she saw proper; but the testator, in the event the wife declined to exercise the power given her, made provision for those who had claims upon his bounty, and intended that those devisees, after the termination of the life estate of the wife, should take what was undisposed of by her. The testator doubtless thought that the necessities or wants of the wife, or the changes that time might bring in reference to the property or its value, might require the expenditure of the whole estate, or that his wife might desire to give the estate to her own kindred instead of having it pass to his; and to provide for her wants or to gratify proper, but if she failed to do this, then the testator provided that his own kindred should take. Here was simply a devise over after the termination of the life estate, and the failure of the life tenant to make any disposition of the property whatever under the power conferred.

In considering a question of the importance that this is, although aided by arguments on each side evidencing great ability and much research, we find it difficult to reconcile many of the cases with the general doctrine on the subject, or to follow them, unless we lose sight of the intention of the maker of this will, and adopt a rule of construction so technical in its character and application as to defeat the very object the testator had in view when executing the paper. His purpose was to give to his wife the benefit of his entire estate, and to provide for his kindred out of that portion of it that might remain undisposed of at her death. After a careful review of all the authorities to which our attention has been called, the rule sanctioned and followed is this: If the estate is given or devised generally or indefinitely, with a power of disposition, it passes a fee; but where the devisor or grantor owning the fee gives to the first taker an estate for life, with the power to dispose of the fee, no greater estate is vested in the first taker than that carved out of the fee, and vested in him by the devisor or grantor. He is given a life estate in express terms, and the failure to exercise the power given to the remainderman the fee, before remarriage passes the fee. Little v. Giles, 25 Neb. 515.

Life estate, with superadded power.

When a testamentary gift is expressly limited to the donee for life, a superadded power given to the donee to sell and appropriate the proceeds will not enlarge his interest into an absolute estate. Rhode Island H. Trust Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 1 New Eng. Rep. 30, 14 R. L. 335; Bean v. Myers, 1 Cold. 225; Davis v. Richardson, 10 Yerg. 290; May v. Joyce, 20 Gratt. 622; Irwin v. Farrar, 10 Ves. Jr. 22.

For an express bequest of an estate for life negatives the intention to give the absolute property, and converts the superadded right of disposition into a mere power. Denson v. Mitchell, 25 Ala. 202.

In such case the remainder over is valid, and at the death of the life tenant takes effect in the remainderman. Harbison v. James, 7 West. Rep. 226, 20 Mo. 411.

A will should, if possible, be construed according to the intention of the testator, and the power bestowed should be treated as power and not as property, in order to give effect to the limitation over. 4 Kent, Com. 422; Jackson v. Robins, 16 Johns. 227, 268; Ayer v. Ayer, 128 Mass. 375; Burwell v. Anderson, 3 Leigh, 342, 256-356; Stuart v. Walker, 72 Mo. 146; McCauley's App. 68 Pa. 102; Flintham's App. 11 Serg. & R. 18; Burlingame v. Clough, 22 N. H. 227; Pennock v. Pennock, L. R. 12 Eq. 144; Herring v. Barron, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 144; Smith v. Bell, 21 U. S. 6 Fed. 68 (6 L. ed. 225).

Where the power of disposal accompanies a bequest or devise of a mere life estate the power is limited to such disposition as a tenant for life can make, unless other words indicate that a larger power was intended. Smith v. Bell, 21 U. S. 6 Fed. 7 L. R. A.

Such a power of disposition does not, however, enlarge the life estate into a fee unless inconsistent with an estate for life only. Glover v. Stillson, 60 Conn. 212; Wetter v. Walker, 22 Ga. 142; Cory v. Cory, 27 N. J. Eq. 122; Rhode Island H. Trust Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 1 New Eng. Rep. 30, 14 R. L. 335.

A power of sale conferred upon the widow in her character as executrix, in order to enable her to accomplish certain purposes having no relation to her own benefit, does not enlarge her estate so as to make it absolute. Robertson v. Robertson, 120 Ind. 222.

A devise of realty to a wife for life, directing her to make large payments out of the estate to a number of relatives, etc., is only for life where the language in which the will makes such disposal of the residue shows that the devise to her was not enlarged into a fee. Lee v. Babcock, 11 Cent. Rep. 744, 45 N. J. Eq. 222.

Where a testator made a bequest of all his estate, real and personal, to his wife, to have and to hold during her life, and to do with it as she saw proper before her death, the wife took a life estate in the property, with only such power as a life tenant can have; and her conveyance of all her real property passed no greater interest. Brant v. Virginia Coal & Iron Co. 90 U. S. 236 (238 L. ed. 227); Patty v. Goolsby, 21 Ark. 61.

The power is limited to such disposition as a tenant for life can make, unless other words clearly indicate that a larger power is intended. Giles v. Little, 104 U. S. 222 (225 L. ed. 745).

It will not enable the donee to mortgage more than his life interest. Rhode Island H. Trust Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, supra.

cause, no disposition having been made of it by the life tenant, he takes under the will or conveyance. It is said: "If an estate be given to a person generally or indefinitely with a power of disposition, it carries a fee, unless the testator gives the first taker an estate for life only, and annexes to it a power of disposition. . . . In that case the express limitation for life will control the operation of the power, and prevent it from enlarging the estate into a fee." 4 Kent, Com. 535, 536.

Counsel for the appellees has referred us to several cases, English and American, in direct antagonism to the doctrine laid down by Chancellor Kent.

In Barford v. Street, 16 Ves. Jr. 135, there was a devise of real and personal estate in trust to pay the rents and dividends to Mary Barford during her life, and after her death to convey according to her appointment, by deed or will, with a limitation over in case of her death in the lifetime of the testator or in default of appointment. Mary Barford filed her bill, in which she alleged that she was, by reason of the unqualified power of appointment by deed or will, invested with the fee; and it was held by Mr William Grant, M. R., that she had the absolute estate, and in determining the extent of her interest he said: "An estate for life, with an unqualified power of appointing the inheritance, comprehends everything."

In the case of May v. Joyner, reported in 20 Gratt. 602, the devise was: "I give to my beloved and excellent wife, subject to the provisions hereafter declared, my whole estate, real and personal, and especially all real estate which I may hereafter acquire, to her during her life, but with full power to make sale of any part of the said estate, and to convey absolute titles to the purchasers, and use the purchase money for investment, or any purpose that she pleases, with only this restriction; that whatever remains at her death shall, after paying any debts she may owe or any legacies she may leave, be divided as follows," etc. The court held that the limitation over was repugnant to the grant of the fee, and that the wife was vested with the absolute estate.

In Pulliam v. Byrd, 2 Stro. Eq. 134, and in Smith v. Bell, Mart. & Y. 302, the same rule was recognized, the court remarking, in the first-named case, that "when a life estate is created in terms, and to this is added a power of ulterior disposition, unconfined as to mode or object, no case has been produced suggesting that this power is a naked power, and requiring to be executed in order to divest the grantor of the fee."

In David v. Bridgman, 2 Yerg. 557, the same utterance is made, the court holding that the wife took the absolute and unqualified property in the estate devised. Following these cases might be cited many others recognizing the rule under which the first taker took the fee, and, whether exercising the power of appointment or not, the limitation over in nearly all the cases was held void, as being repugnant to the fee.

In view of these authorities, it is maintained that, although the wife, Harriet, in this case, was given a life estate, there was coupled with it a power to dispose of the entire estate for her own use or that of another at any time during her life, or to pass it by her will at her death; and, as no greater dominion could have been exercised over it by the deviser if he were living, the fee must necessarily have passed to the wife, and such was the intention of the testator. The argument certainly strikes one with much force, for, if the dominion over the estate is such that it can be used, conveyed, devised or otherwise disposed of by the donee without restriction or limitation, the power over it is as great as any that could have been exercised by the one grantor or deviser in whom the title to the estate was originally vested. We perceive, however, no reason why such a power may not be conferred, if it appears from a consideration of the whole will that the intention of the testator was not to create a fee in the first taker. The right of absolute dominion and control, with the power to sell or devise, would, unexplained, pass the absolute estate. In this case the testator proceeds in the first place to give to his wife, Harriet, during her life, all his estate, real and personal, with the full power to dispose of the whole of it as she pleases. Now, if he had intended to vest the wife with the fee, or to give her the absolute estate without any limitation, it could have been readily expressed, and there would have been no necessity for carving a life estate out of the fee, and then conferring upon the life tenant the power to pass the fee by deed or will, if she desired to do so. The provision of the will giving the wife this power shows that upon its exercise alone could the wife pass the fee, so as to defeat the objects of the testator's bounty, designated to take the remainder. Such was his plain intention. He described the estate in express terms that the wife was to have, and that was a life estate; but as she might need the entire estate, or desire to make some other disposition of it than that I have made, I will vest in her the power to destroy the rights of those in remainder, and she may dispose of the whole of it; but, failing to do so, the remainder will pass to those who are named to take at her death.

The provisions of the will were plain and easily understood. The testator had placed it within the power of his wife to destroy the devises made to his own kindred, and by will or deed give it to those of her own blood. The wife must have known the contents of the will, and, although living for many years after her husband's death, failed or declined to disturb the devises to his kindred, but left the estate to pass in the precise manner the testator wished. The fact of a life estate having been carved out for the wife with a power to appoint or dispose of as she pleased, and if she fails to appoint or dispose of the estate to pass to others in remainder, negatives the idea that the testator intended to vest in the wife the absolute fee.

As said in Burleigh v. Clough, 53 N.H. 267, where a testator gives a life estate, with a general power of appointment of the inheritance, and, in case of a failure to appoint, gives the estate to other parties, the latter take a vested remainder, subject to be defeated by the exercise of the power. Where an estate is given for life only, though a general power of appointment is annexed, it does not convert the estate into a fee, but the donee takes a life estate, unless there is some manifest general in tent to the contrary in the instrument creating the power. 4 Kent, Com. 819; Pulliam v. Byrd, 2 Strob. Eq. 134; Bentham v. Smith, Cheves, Eq. 83, 84 Am. Dec. 599; Johnson v. Oushing, 15 N. H. 298.

In 16 Johns. 587, in the case of Jackson v. Robins, Chancellor Kent said: "We may lay it down as an incontrovertible rule that, where an estate is given to a person generally or indefinitely with a power of disposition, it carries a fee, and the only exception to the rule is where the testator gives to the first taker an estate for life only by certain and express words, and annexes to it a power of disposal. In that particular and special case the devisee for life will not take an estate in fee, notwithstanding the distinct and naked gift of a power of disposition of the reversion. This distinction is carefully marked and settled in the cases."

In Fairman v. Beal, 14 Ill. 244, the testator devised his farm, describing it, to his wife "during her natural life, to take the issues and profits thereof; at her death she may dispose of as she pleases." The wife under this power conveyed the land to Waddle, the court holding that the wife took a life estate under her husband's will, with the power to dispose of the inheritance, and, as the mode of exerting the power was not prescribed by the will, the conveyance made by the wife was a rightful exertion of the power.

In the case of Glover v. Stillson, 56 Conn. 816, the will contained this provision: "I give, devise and bequeath the residue of my estate, both real and personal, unto my sisters, Polly A. Stillson and Mary A. Stilson, for the term of their natural lives; hereby empowering my sisters to dispose of any portion of my estate, either real or personal, if they should so desire." It was held that the life estate was not enlarged into a fee by the power given to sell.

In Funk v. Eggleston, 92 Ill. 515, the testator devised, after the payment of debts, "two thirds of my real and personal estate," to his wife, "during her life, with full power and authority for her to dispose of the same as she may think proper," by will or otherwise, before her death. The testator then proceeded to dispose of what estate might remain undisposed of by his wife at her death. It was held that the wife had a life estate only, with power of disposition by will or deed.

In the case of Moore v. Webb, 2 B. Mon. 283, the life tenant had exerted the power; and in Ball v. Hancock, 83 Ky. 107, there was no estate for life.

In Caleb v. Field, 9 Dana, 846, the doctrine established in this case is recognized, but is not decisive of the question.

We are to arrive at the intention of the testator in interpreting his will by looking to the whole instrument and the objects of his bounty. That his wife was first looked to as the prime object of his care is evident, but in the event she did not wish to appropriate all the estate by making a disposition of it, as authorized, he saw proper to provide for others. It seems to us the only question presented in this case is, Can a testator, in disposing of his estate by will, create a life estate in one with remainder to another, and at the same time give to the life tenant the power to defeat the remainder by disposing of the property by deed or devise to whomsoever he pleases? It will not be contended that, with a devise of the absolute fee in the first taker, a limitation over can be upheld; but there is no such devise in the will before us, but the testator, with the right to dispose of his property as he sees proper by last will, having complied with the rules of law in its execution, has given to his wife a life estate in all the property he owned, with the right to dispose of it as she may please, but if she fails to do so the devisee over takes the estate. The testator in this case is particular to name each one of those to take the remainder, making a special devise to each, and in more than one provision of the will is disposing of what his wife may leave of the devised property by reason of her failure to exercise the power given her.

We think there is a marked distinction between a power given to one who already has the fee and that given to a life tenant, who may acquire the fee by the exercise of the power given him. In the latter instance it is the manifest intention of the testator that the life tenant must acquire the fee in the mode provided by the will, and, if the power is not exerted, those in remainder take the estate. In our opinion, therefore, the devisees of the testator are entitled to the estate, and not the heirs of the wife.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the answer, and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Messrs. I. R. Clark and Fletcher Ramsey, for defendant:

There is evidence that there was a trust instrument existing. If there was such a trust instrument, it can be identified, and connected with Bray's deed by parol.

Cleveland v. Hallett, 8 Cusb. 400.

Bray's deed to Vincent, trustee, gives notice that there was a trust, and raises a presumption that a trust existed, of the terms of which we are ignorant, and cannot tell what equitable estates in persons other than Mrs. Dexter may exist under it.

Sturtevant v. Jaques, 14 Allen, 533; Smith v. Burges, 133 Mass. 511.

Devann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Dixon will, as it has been termed, is not before us, but it is assumed by both parties that Bray, who was the trustee thereunder and his successor, had full right to convey in fee the premises the title to which has been discussed in the case at bar. If the deed made by him to "William H. Vincent, trustee for Mrs. Sarah Ellen Dexter, his heirs and assigns," did not pass an absolute fee but an estate for the life of Mrs. Dexter only, so that if the title of Vincent is vested in the plaintiff, it would not be an absolute fee, yet the confirmatory release from Bray's successor in the trust under the Dixon will and that from Cordelia Tremlett, the sole heir and cestui que trust under the Dixon will, to the plaintiff must have transferred to him all title to any trust resulting to the Dixon estate. McElroy v. McElroy, 118 Mass. 509.

It is also clear that the plaintiff has all the title both of Vincent, the trustee, and Mrs. Dexter. By Vincent's will he devised all his real estate to his wife for life, the remainder to Mrs. Dexter for the benefit of herself and children. Vincent having deceased and subsequently Mrs. Vincent, any possible life estate of Mrs. Vincent has terminated. Mrs. Dexter has now also deceased, having devised all her estate to her two daughters, who were her only heirs, and who have conveyed to the plaintiff.

The bill in the case at bar is for a decree requiring the defendant to specifically perform her contract to purchase these premises which is resisted by her upon the allegation that the title offered by the plaintiff is defective, the memorandum of sale requiring that the premises should be conveyed "by a good and suffi-

Suffolk County, appointing a trustee in place of Vincent, deceased, terminating the trust and directing a confirmatory release to the plaintiff, which release has since been made. These proceedings, by agreement of counsel, are to be taken as if completed before the tender. Wood v. Donovan, 114 Mass. 181.

The defendant objects that the trusts on which Vincent held may at some future time be proved to have included other beneficiaries beside Mrs. Dexter who may hereafter make successful claim to the estate. It is agreed by the parties that if, under the facts and circumstances, the trust to Vincent does not constitute a material defect in the title, the decree is to be entered for the plaintiff.

It is suggested by the defendant that there may be some instrument or deed of trust, and that such is implied by the deed to Vincent, as trustee, under which there may be equitable rights in persons other than Mrs. Dexter, and that thus the title is clouded.

As she was the only person named for whom Vincent held in trust, it is only by some effort that an ulterior or more remote trust can be imagined. Every reasonable attempt appears to have been made to ascertain whether there was or could have been any other trust than that for Mrs. Dexter, and none such has been disclosed, nor has there been evidence of any. The trust in the deed to Vincent was complete in itself; it named the subject of the trust, the trustee and the cestui que trust and the only trust disclosed has been extinguished by the vesting of the estate in the cestui que trust. Even if the trust of Mrs. Dexter was for life only, the word "heirs" not being mentioned in connection with Mrs. Dexter's name, it was not the less a definite trust for her alone so far as it was disclosed, and any estate beyond, if any there was, this the plaintiff has by confirmatory deed from the successor of Bray, the original trustee under the Dixon will.

Again, a bona fide purchaser for value of the premises under the title now offered would be protected by the Statute, which enacts that "no trust concerning lands, whether implied by law or created or declared by the parties, shall defeat the title of a purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice of the trust." The only trust of which there is notice, or as to which there is anything to put a purchaser on inquiry, was definite and complete on its face, and has been extinguished. If there was any other trust than that for Mrs. Dexter so far as it was possible this has terminated by the decree of the probate court after full public notice and the appointment of a guardian ad litem to represent all parties who might then or thereafter be interested ordering the trustee appointed in place of Vincent to release to the plaintiff.

Under all the circumstances, we think the plaintiff has offered the defendant a title which is good beyond reasonable doubt. Sturtevant v. Jaques, 14 Allen, 533; Smith v. Burges, 133 Mass. 511.

v.
NEW YORK & NEW ENGLAND R.
CO.

(...Mass....)

It is not negligence as matter of law for a passenger upon a railroad train—who is familiar with the management of railroads, and who knows from his familiarity with the train schedule that a collision between the train upon which he is riding and one coming from the opposite direction is imminent and liable to occur at any moment because of the negligence of the company's employes—to go forward into the baggage car and, just as the trains are about to collide, to jump to the ground, so as to prevent his recovering from the company the damages thereby occasioned, even although passengers who retained their seats in the cars were not seriously injured; the question as to the existence of negligence on his part is for the jury under all the circumstances of the case.

(May 10, 1890.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to a judgment of the Superior Court for Suffolk County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for injuries received by plaintiff in jumping from defendant's train which was about to collide with a train coming from the opposite direction. Overruled.

After the evidence was all in, defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that there was no evidence to show that plaintiff was in the exercise of due care, and that therefore he could not maintain the action; and that he was wrongfully in the baggage car at the time of the injury, and that the fact of his being there contributed to his injury and he could not recover. The court refused to give these instructions, but instructed the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"If the plaintiff's own evidence shows that he has left the place assigned for passengers, and is occupying an exposed position, and that the injury is due, in part, to the fact of such position, then he must necessarily fail unless he can also make it appear, upon some ground of necessity or propriety, that his being in that position was consistent with the exercise of proper care and caution upon his part. If a man voluntarily, and for his own convenience, takes an exposed position which is not intended for passengers, and while in this position an emergency occurs, and he is placed in an exciting and alarming situation by the defendant's wrong doing, he cannot recover, although what he does in the emergency would have been justified had he not been in such a position.

"If the plaintiff went into the baggage car simply to ride as a passenger, or simply out of motives of curiosity, and while there an emergency happened and he jumped and was injured, then he cannot recover.

"If, however, the plaintiff, while riding in the smoking car where he had a right to be, was placed in a perilous situation in consequence of the defendant's failure to fulfill its obligations, and as a prudent precaution, for the purpose of self-preservation, went into the baggage car intending to jump in case the other train did approach, then the fact of his being in the baggage car just before jumping does not prevent the plaintiff from maintaining the action, if, while endeavoring to escape, he conducted himself with ordinary and reasonable prudence and discretion.

"If you find that his going into the baggage car was under a reasonable apprehension of danger, then comes another question, which is this: Was his going into the baggage car a reasonable precaution to avoid actual danger, such as persons of common prudence and discretion would naturally take or be likely to take under the same circumstances? If there was any want of due care in his own conduct which contributed to the injury, he cannot recover, however great the defendant's fault; and it must appear that under all the circumstances in which he was placed his conduct and the course he pursued was the natural, proper and prudent precaution for the preservation of his life.

"In considering this, the law does not hold a man under circumstances like those in this case where a collision is about to take place, it does not hold him bound to do the best and the wisest thing under all the circumstances. It only holds him to that degree of care which other men of prudence and discretion would exercise under like circumstances. The fact that one man ran back is not conclusive upon the question that that was the best thing for this man to do, or the fact that some men jumped off the engine is not conclusive that that was the best for the plaintiff, to run and jump off. The mere fact that one man does one thing, and one another, is not conclusive, but the jury are to take all the circumstances in the case and to say whether the course which this man pursued, under all the circumstances, was a reasonable, prudent and discreet one. If you find that it was, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover. If you find that it was not, then your verdict should be for the defendant."

The defendant excepted to the rulings and to the refusals to rule, and, a verdict having been returned in favor of plaintiff, brought the case to this court.

Devens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was admitted that the collision between the train on which the plaintiff was a passenger and another train coming in the opposite direction occurred through the negligence of defendant's servants. The question for the jury was only whether the plaintiff was, himself, in the exercise of due care, or was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury. The plaintiff had taken his seat in that portion of the compartment car, used, also, for the baggage, which was appropriated to smokers, and was reading his paper when the train started. He did not at first notice that the train had commenced its journey, but after it was fairly might occur at any moment. He threw down his cigar, passed into the baggage portion of the compartment car, stood at the door with his hand upon the knob, prepared to jump and did jump just before the two trains collided.

If a passenger is in so dangerous a situation by reason of the peril arising from an accident for the occurrence of which those who undertake to transport him are responsible, as to render his jumping a reasonable precaution, and is injured thereby, they are answerable to him in damages even if he might safely have retained his seat. Ingalls v. Bills, 9 Met. 1; Sears v. Dennis, 105 Mass. 510; Worthen v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 125 Mass. 99; Linnahan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 806.

It is the contention of the defendant that the action of the plaintiff in going into the baggage compartment shows a lack of due care on his part which should prevent him from maintaining this action, that he was wrongfully there, without any justifying emergency, and thus that he assumed all the risks incident thereto. Bates v. Old Colony R. Co. 147 Mass. 265, 265, 6 New Eng. Rep. 553.

The plaintiff did not go into the baggage compartment for the purpose of being there transported, but in order to do something to save himself if a collision occurred. He was accustomed to the management of railroads, had often worked upon them, and might expect that he could, with a reasonable chance of safety, leap from the train when collision was imminent. The defendant urges that as by his own admissions it appears that plaintiff knew that the place he assumed was more dangerous than that he left, and that the rear car was the safest place in the train, these facts are conclusive that the plaintiff was negligent in going there. No such conclusion follows. The place where he sat and the rear car were safer if plaintiff proposed to do nothing to extricate himself from the peril in which the defendant had placed him. He could not in either place ascertain when the collision would take place and could there only abide the shock. Nor could he get to the end of the rear car without danger. He could not tell when the collision would occur; it might be that he would be thrown down in passing from one car to the other or in walking along the alley of the car with his back to the engine when he would be in most serious danger. Even if all the passengers in the two cars who remained in their seats in ignorance of the impending danger had escaped without injury it would not be conclusive that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in going into the baggage car, or had recklessly or unwisely misjudged what was prudent for him to attempt. Buel v. New York Cent. R. Co. 81 N. Y. 814, 818.

The prudence of the plaintiff's conduct is not necessarily to be tested by the results of the accident to others in a different position. Even if it were, as the case reported shows that serious injury did result to those who were sitting or moving in those parts of the train appropriated to passengers. It is entirely possible that plaintiff would have sustained more serious injury if he had remained in his seat or had attempted to reach the end of the rear car than he did by his action. The question whether the plaintiff acted with due and reasonable care under all the circumstances was one peculiarly for the jury and was submitted under proper instructions.

Exceptions overruled.

Commercial Bank v. Marine Bank, 8 Keyes, 387.

Messrs. Patterson & Thomas for appellee.

Reed, C., delivered the following opinion:

Coors, the appellant, who was defendant below, was, and for many years had been, a brewer at Golden, Jefferson County. His sales were mostly by car lots or large quantities, shipped to various parties, and sold on time. It was his custom on the shipment to fill an order, to draw a draft payable to his own order, and, at the expiration of the time of credit given, send the draft to the consignee for acceptance, to be returned to him. F. E. Everett was a private banker at Golden, and had been for many years. In July, 1884, he died insolvent. He kept an account and transacted business with appellee in Denver, and acted as agent and correspondent of appellee at Golden. Appellant, Coors, transacted his business and kept his account with Everett until the time of his death. His accepted drafts, when returned to him, were by him indorsed in blank, and deposited with Everett, the proceeds to be placed to his credit when collected. When in need of money, he made his notes payable to Everett, by whom they were discounted. It appears that Everett was in the habit of re-discounting these notes with appellee, which fact was not known to Coors; and, as appellee was in the habit of transmitting the notes at maturity to Everett for collection, Coors did not, necessarily, know that the notes had been re-discounted.

On the 26th of March, 1884, Coors made his note to Everett for $1,500, payable ninety days after date, with interest. On the 8th of May, Coors made a note for $1,000, with interest,

NOTE—Banking; ownership of paper indorsed in blank.

Where an owner of a note indorsed it in blank and placed it for collection in a bank, which indorsed it payable to its account and transmitted it to defendants for collection, who collected it without notice as to who was the real owner, defendants are liable to the owner for the amount collected, unless they have purchased the note, or made advances, or given credit upon it in ignorance of the true owner. Hackett v. Reynolds, 5 Cent. Rep. 621, 114 Pa. 323.

To constitute a defense to an action for the proceeds of the note brought by the owner, defendants must show not only that balances were suffered to remain upon the faith of the remittance, but also that defendants, relying upon the remittance, incurred some liability or actually did, or forebore to do, something by which their condition was worse than it would otherwise have been. Id.

payable to Everett sixty days after date, which was the note on which this suit was brought. Both notes were indorsed in blank by Everett, and re-discounted for him by the appellee. After the death of Everett, Coors opened an account with the appellee.

On the 8th day of May, 1884, Coors drew a draft on Keppler & Co., of Leadville, payable at sixty days, for $471.90. On the 21st of May he drew a second draft on Keppler for the same amount, at sixty days. On the 27th of May he drew his draft on Dyer & Northington, of Rawlins, Wyo., for $748.25, at sixty days. On May 14 he drew his draft on Crystal Bros., Pitkin, Colo., for $228, at seventy-five days,—all of which drafts were accepted by the drawees, returned to Coors, indorsed by him in blank, and deposited with Everett for collection. The drafts above described amounted in the aggregate to $2,181.12. The drafts were not discounted by Everett, nor passed by him to the credit of Coors.

On the 24th of June, when the two notes of Coors for the sums, respectively, of $1,500 and $1,000, were nearing maturity, Everett applied to appellee to have the Coors drafts above described, and perhaps others, discounted to meet the maturing notes. On the 27th of June an interview was had on the same subject, at which appellee declined to discount drafts to meet both notes, but discounted drafts on Crystal Bros. for $228, Keppler's draft of May 21 for $471.90, and draft on Dyer & Northington for $748.25, to pay the note of $1,500. The note, having been paid by Everett to appellee, was returned to Everett; and Coors, knowing nothing of the discount of his drafts by Everett to pay the note, and having no knowledge of the re-discount of the note by appellee, paid the same to Everett. The other drafts, not discounted, were left with appellee for collection. When collected, the proceeds were to be put to the credit of Everett.

At the time of Everett's death, the note of Coors for $1,000 was unpaid in the hands of appellee. There was at that time, or afterwards, a small balance in its hands, the proceeds of collections of Coors' drafts, to the credit of Everett. At the time of the bringing of this suit there was also in the hands of appellee a small balance to the credit of Coors. This suit was brought to recover the amount of the $1,000 note. The defendant pleaded payment, and set up as counterclaims the amounts received by appellee on each of the above-mentioned drafts of Coors, collected by appellee. The case was tried by the court without a jury, who allowed as offsets the balance of proceeds of the Coors drafts to the credit of Everett in the hands of the appellee, and the balance on the account of Coors in the Bank to the credit of Coors, leaving a balance on the note of $364.18, for which appellee had judgment. There was no serious dispute in regard to the facts. It was not claimed that Coors had any knowledge of the re-discounts of the notes made by Everett with appellee, nor the transfer and discounts of his drafts left for collection with Everett; nor is it claimed that appellee had any actual notice or knowledge that Everett was not the owner of the drafts of Coors.

The contention for Coors is: first, that under the circumstances proved, as above stated, appellee could not acquire title to the drafts; second, that by the language used in the letters of Everett in regard to the Coors drafts, appellee was notified, or should have been, that they were not the property of Everett, but of Coors. The language relied upon was as follows:

"Golden, Colo., July 8th, 1884.

"W. I. Jenkins, Esq., Cashier, Denver.

"Dear Sir: I advise Cr. to-day of 15,844, A. Coors, due Ju. 27, $1,500, int. $5, $1,505. Of the list of collections left with you of his, amt'g $2,617.05, $697 has been paid, & placed to Cr. my ac.," etc.

Also of July 12th:

"I note disc'ts Coors, $1,438.55, from list, leaving our 20,144, $471.90, due 10th, and extended five days as a collection for Cr. when paid."

And from a memorandum made by Everett, and handed Jenkins, cashier of appellee, dated June 27, on which Everett had written:

"Discount A. Coors accept'cs, coll'n No. 20,144. Rem. June 6th, Keppler & Company, Leadville, due June 23 & 26th, $468.75," etc.

We do not think the position of counsel on this last point tenable, and that there was anything in the language used by which appellee could be informed of anything in regard to the ownership of the drafts. It can only be regarded as description to designate the paper. We can find no authority, and none is cited by counsel, where it is held that any such descriptive language can be construed to indicate ownership; and certainly no such interference could arise when Everett was the holder of them, properly indorsed without limitation, and dealing with them as his own.

The only question to be determined is whether Coors, having indorsed the drafts in blank to Everett for the purpose of having them collected and the proceeds placed to his credit, and Everett, wrongfully assuming to be the owner, could sell and dispose of them, and appellee, without knowledge of the want of ownership in Everett, could be invested with good title, so as to retain the proceeds as against Coors.

It is a well-settled rule of law that one who acquires negotiable paper, in the usual course of business, before maturity, in good faith, for a valuable consideration, from one capable of transferring the same, becomes a bona fide holder, and takes it divested of all prior equities. See § 4, chap. 1, Code.

And it has been so held in this court. Wyman v. Colorado Nat. Bank, 5 Colo. 30, and Merchants Bank v. McClelland, 9 Colo. 608.

It is contended by the able counsel of appellant that "it was the duty of the bank proposing to purchase from Everett to have sought Coors, and ascertained from him whether Everett had any authority to sell or not." This is not in harmony with the law or the decisions of this court.

In Merchants Bank v. McClelland, supra, it was said by the present chief justice, at page 610, 9 Colo.: "If there is nothing upon the face of a negotiable instrument or in the written indorsement or assignment to notify the assignee that the instrument was originally given upon an illegal consideration (gambling recover as against the maker. This is true, even though such assignee be in possession of facts or circumstances sufficient to arouse suspicion in the mind of a person of ordinary prudence, and though he is guilty of negligence in not first following up such information, for the purpose of discovering the fraud or illegality to which the suspicious circumstances may seem to point." The rule adopted in this court is that of the federal courts and a majority of the States. See Bank of Metropo'is v. New England Bank, 42 U. S. 1 How. 234 [11 L. ed. 115]; 47 U. S. 6 How. 212 [12 L. ed. 409]; Swift v. Smith, 102 U. S. 442 [26 L. ed. 193]; Holchies v. Nat. Shoe & Leather Bank, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 354 [22 L. ed. 645]; Murray v. Lardner, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 110 [17 L. ed. 857]; Brown v. Spofford, 95 U. S. 474 [24 L. ed. 504].

We are aware that in the State of New York, and some other States, following its decisions, founded in reason, and necessary in the interest of commerce, that requires that such paper should be allowed to pass from hand to hand with the greatest freedom possible consistent with safety; and it works no injustice to the owner of paper to say that he shall be held responsible for his own acts and not an innocent party who has been misled by them. Coors could by a word have limited his indorsement so as to protect himself and others. That he failed to do so was not the fault of appellee, but his own, and he must suffer the loss according to a principle so well known that a repetition here is unnecessary. The judgment should be affirmed.

Pattison and Richmond, JJ., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

Bradley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The premises in question were sold by the defendant Borthwick as sheriff of the County of Cortland, upon two executions issued upon judgments held by the defendant Pierce as administrator, etc., of Thomas Galvin, deceased, against Mary Sullivan, and bid off by Pierce as such administrator on the first day of August, 1884. No redemption was made within the year, and on Saturday, the 31st day of October, 1885, at 12 o'clock noon, Esther K. Porter, as assignee of Oliver Porter of a judgment recovered on that day by him against Mary Sullivan, redeemed the premises from the sale by paying the sheriff the amount paid for them on such sale with interest, and by presenting the requisite papers for such purpose to the sheriff who delivered to her the certificate required by the Statute. Code, § 1468.

The next day was Sunday, and on Monday following (November 2, at 11:15 A. M.), the defendant Pierce, as such administrator, proceeded to redeem the premises upon a judgment recovered by him as such administrator against Mary Sullivan November 19, 1884, and then took a certificate of redemption from the sheriff, who afterwards made to him a deed pursuant to such redemption. The certificate made to Esther K. Porter was afterwards assigned by her to the plaintiff, and he brought this action to set aside that deed and to require the defendant Borthwick to make to him a deed. And the ground upon which such relief is sought, is that the redemption by the defendant Pierce was not made within the time in which by the Statute he was permitted to make it.

The statutory provision from which was derived the right to make that redemption is that "a creditor who might have redeemed within fifteen months after the sale, . . . may redeem from any other redeeming creditor, although the fifteen months have elapsed; provided that he thus redeems within twenty-four hours after the last previous redemption." Id. § 1454.

This was not done by the defendant within the requisite time, and his redemption was ineffectual if Sunday should have been included within the time in which he was permitted to make it. That day, like any other, occupies time, and, except so far as prohibited by the common law or the Statute, transactions on that day, not in themselves immoral, are not unlawful or invalid. Story v. Elliot, 8 Cow. 27; Nayles v. Smith, 12 Wend. 57.

But for reasons founded in public policy, the maxim dies non juridicus is given a liberal construction and effect, so as to embrace in it that which may be deemed within its purpose and meaning. Fyeld v. Park, 20 Johns. 140; Van Vechten v. Paddock, 12 Johns. 178.

It is now quite well established that the observance of the Sabbath day as such is a right which may be enjoyed without molestation by transactions of a secular character. Hence 7 L. R. A.

Sunday cannot, for the purpose of performing a contract, be regarded as a day in law, and, when it is due on Sunday, performance on Monday following is in time. Avery v. Stewart, 2 Conn. 69, 7 Am. Dec. 240; Salter v. Burt, 20 Wend. 205; Howard v. Joss, 1 Hill, 263; Campbell v. International L. Assur. Society, 4 Bosw. 299.

When the Statute requires that something be done within a given time, it must be so done, and although the last day be Sunday, it must be embraced in the computation of the time. Ex parte Dodge, 7 Cow. 147; People v. Luther, 1 Wend. 42.

This is not uniformly the rule applied when the time is less than a week. Anonymous, 3 Hill, 375.

But, however that may be, the situation in the present case was peculiar; and although the transaction of the redemption made by the defendant may not come within acts prohibited by law to be performed on Sunday, there was a difficulty in the way of the exercise of that right by him on that day, arising out of the Statute, which provides that a redemption made by a creditor on or after the last day of the fifteen months, must be made at the sheriff's office. Code, § 1455.

And it cannot then lawfully be made elsewhere. Morris v. Purvis, 63 N. Y. 225.

The sheriff is required himself, or by his under-sheriff or deputy, to be in attendance at the sheriff's office, and keep it open on that day, and each day thereafter on which redemption can be made. But the sheriff is not required to have his office open on Sunday. 3 Rev. Stat. 245, § 55.

The defendant, therefore, had not the right to make the redemption on Sunday. The purpose of the Statute was that a judgment creditor should have such right, and for its accomplishment twenty-four hours after the making of the next previous redemption. If the Statute should be given the construction and effect to include Sunday within that time when the last day of the fifteen months falls on Sunday, the redemption made on the Saturday before might operate to defeat the right of redemption by another creditor however diligent he might be in his attempt to exercise it. The effect would be the same if the last day of the fifteen months was Saturday and a redemption made on that day. It might be made at the last moment of Saturday, and the twenty-four hours would expire with Sunday. In practical effect the lawful denial of the exercise of the right of redemption on Sunday would be no different than the inhibition of it by law on that day. The Statute is entitled to a construction which will permit its purpose to be effectuated. The legislative intent evidently was to permit, within the time prescribed, any creditor entitled to do it, to effect redemption by way of protection of his right as such; and that he should have twenty-four hours for that purpose. It would therefore seem that to carry out such intention when Sunday intervened, it must be deemed dies non within the contemplation of the Statute. And the statutes before referred to may be treated as in pari materia, and taken to provide for redemption within twenty-four hours of the day or days in which the sheriff is required to be in attendance at his office, to enable the creditor to exercise his right in that respect. Any other view might deny to the Statute the apparent purposes of its makers. If these views are correct the redemption by the defendant on Monday, the 2d day of November, was in due time and regularly made, and the judgment should be affirmed.

DEPOSIT BANK of Georgetown, Appt.,

FAYETTE NATIONAL BANK.

SAME v. SECOND NATIONAL BANK of Lexington.

(....Ky.....)

A bank which pays forged checks, purporting to have been drawn by one of its depositors, to other banks which had in good faith advanced money on them to the forger, must, as between itself and the other banks, bear the loss, especially where the depositor lived near by and the checks continued to be presented and paid for several months before the forgery was discovered.

(March 8, 1890.)

APPEALS by plaintiff from judgments of the Circuit Court for Fayette County dismissing its petitions in actions brought to recover back the money which it had paid on certain forged checks, from the banks by which they had been cashed and forwarded for collection and to which payment had been made. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. Duvall, Breckinridge & Shelby and William Lindsay for appellant.

Messrs. J. D. Hunt and Beck & Thornton for appellees.

Fryor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two cases involve similar questions, and have therefore been considered as one case. The Deposit Bank of Georgetown, the appellant in this court and the plaintiff below, paid a number of forged checks purporting to have been drawn on that Bank by one of its depositors, Thomas J. Burgess. The checks were successively presented through a period of four or five months, there being eighteen in number, and were all paid by the Georgetown Bank in good faith, and before any discovery of the fraud had been made. All the checks were drawn in the name of Thomas J. Burgess, who was a regular depositor and customer of the Bank, the first check having been paid early in December of the year 1883, and the last check paid in April, 1884. The name of Burgess was discovered to be a forgery on the 8th of May, and notice given to the appellees, the two Banks to whom these checks were presented and paid, on the 9th of that month. John R. Wolfe, who had committed all these forgeries, had at one time been a clerk in the Bank of the appellant, and was in that way familiar with the account and deposits of Burgess. The checks were drawn by Thomas J. Burgess, whose name was forged, in favor of Williamson & Wolfe, on the appellant, and were presented to the two Lexington Banks by John R. Wolfe, the payee, and payment asked of these Banks. The Fayette National Bank, before advancing the money on the first check, made inquiry as to the account of Burgess, and, receiving a satisfactory response, upon the indorsement made by Williamson & Wolfe, paid over the money. Wolfe was identified, and no reason on the part of the Fayette National Bank existed for indulging a suspicion as to the bona fides of the transaction. There were sixteen checks in all taken up by this Bank, and forwarded to the drawee, the appellant. They were taken in the usual course of business, and when sent to the Georgetown Bank charged to the account of its depositor, Burgess. There was in fact no such firm as Williamson & Wolfe, but the fictitious firm name used by Wolfe in the perpetration of his forgeries. Both the appellant and the appellees acted in good faith, the former believing that Burgess was in fact the drawer of the paper, and the latter advancing its money on the

The banker is bound to know the handwriting of his customer, and the drawee is bound to know the signature of his drawer; and one who parts with money by reason of his negligence in this regard must bear the loss. *Price v. checks supposing (Wolfe having been identified) that it would be paid, as it was, by the Georgetown Bank, and charged to the account of the drawer.

Which of the Banks should lose the money, —the Bank at Georgetown, where the depositor, Burgess, whose name had been forged, deposited his money, or the Banks at Lexington, where the money was paid to Wolfe under the belief that the checks were genuine, and Burgess in fact the drawer? It is evident that the Bank at Georgetown honored the checks drawn upon it by Burgess, for the reason that its officers believed the name of the drawer was genuine; and, if the liability of the Lexington Banks to refund this money is to be determined by the well-known rule of law applicable to the payment of money through a mistake of fact, the judgment in this case is erroneous. It is insisted, however, that it is a rule of commercial law long since recognized, and now firmly established, applicable at least between parties equally innocent of fraud, that the Bank or its officers must know the signature of its depositor; and if such a doctrine is made to apply in this case, the appellant is the loser, and the judgment dismissing its petition was proper.

The rule laid down by Lord Mansfield is that, if the banker or drawee makes a payment or gives credit upon the strength of a forged signature, the loss must be his, as between himself and the holder. "He has not known what he is bound to know." Price v. Neale, 3 Burr. 1355.

This doctrine of commercial law has been followed and recognized by nearly all the courts of the country, and as said by Mr. Justice Story in the case of Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Georgia, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 833 [6 L. ed. 334], delivered in 1825, has never been departed from, and, in the earlier cases on the subject, able jurists, in alluding to this rule, regarded it as essential as a rule of justice and right between business men. Mr. Morse, in his work on Banking, has collated the authorities, and presented what he terms the modern doctrine on this subject; but after a careful examination of the authorities referred to, it will be found that the decided weight of authority is with Lord Mansfield, and the rule laid down in Price v. Neale is criticized only as being too sweeping in its character. Nor is it just to say that the rule adopted requiring the bank to know the signature of its depositor is without an exception; for it is undoubtedly true that the neglect or knowledge of intervening parties who come into the possession of the check, and receive the money on it from the bank where it is payable, will in some instances be of such a character as to enable the bank to recover back the money. This doctrine is recognized by Mr. Daniel in his work on Negotiable Instruments; and, while doubting the justice of the rule recognized by nearly all the authorities, under which the bank is required to know the signature of its depositor, he proceeds to say that when one knows that it is a forgery, or takes it "under circumstances of suspicion, without proper precaution, or whose conduct has been such as to mislead the bank," the money may be recovered back. Vol. 2, p. 669.

The case of National Bank of North America v. Bangs, reported in 106 Mass. 441, and relied on by counsel for the appellant in this case, was where a stranger giving his name as "William D. Riskford" drew his check, payable to the order of E. D. & G. W. Bangs, on the National Bank of North America. Bangs indorsed the check, and the bank paid the money, and, when discovering the forgery, notified Bangs, the payee and indorser, and sued to recover the money back, and a judgment was obtained. This, we think, was proper, as it would be an exceedingly harsh rule to permit one who negotiates with the payor, and obtains his check payable to the use of the party obtaining the money, who then indorses it to a bank, to hold on to the money when the payee has himself contracted with the payor, and given credit to the payor by his indorsement, that led the bank to believe the paper was genuine.

The case of Ellis v. Ohio L. Ins. & Trust Co., reported in 4 Ohio St. 628, sustains this view of the question. The case relied on is unlike the case before us. The Banks at Lexington took the checks in the usual course of business, with the indorsement of the payee, and then indorsed the paper for collection, forwarding it to appellant's Bank, where the money was credited to the Lexington Banks, and charged to the account of the one supposed to be the bona fide drawer of the paper.

In the case relied on, of National Bank of North America v. Bangs, it is said: "If the suit were between the bank or drawee and a party who took the check in the usual course of business, finding it in circulation, or even by first indorsement from the payee, the loss would fall upon the bank; because, having greater means and opportunity to become familiar with the handwriting of their correspondents or depositors, the law presumes that drawees will know their signatures and be able to detect forgeries. . . . But this responsibility, based upon presumption alone, is decisive only when the party receiving the money has in no way contributed to the success of the fraud, or to the mistake of fact under which the payment was made."

There is a manifest distinction between the case of one who is both the payee and indorser of the check, and who negotiates directly with the payor in the loan or advance of the money for which the check is given, and a bank taking a check by indorsement from the payee in the usual course of business, with no ground of suspicion, and that receives the money on the check from a bank where the funds of the drawer are deposited. One of the two innocent parties must suffer, and there must be some rule of commercial law to guide banks and business men in this character of business transactions. Therefore, when a bank has the means of knowing the signature of the drawer of a check upon it by reason of the drawer being its depositor or customer, the relation between the bank and its depositor is such that the bank must be presumed to know that the signature is genuine when making payment.

The case of Ellis v. Ohio L. Ins. & Trust Co., reported in 4 Ohio St. 628, recognizes this rule, and says the foundation for it is: "The party is supposed to know his own handwriting in the one case, or that of his customer or correspondent in the other, much better than the holder can; and the law therefore allows the holder to cast upon him the entire responsibility of determining as to the genuineness of the instrument, and, if he fails to discover the forgery, imputes to him negligence, and, as between him and the innocent holder, compels him to suffer the loss."

After conceding the general doctrine on the subject, the court proceeds to say that the holder may by his negligent conduct deprive himself of the benefit of this rule, and that case was decided upon the ground that the holder had contributed to induce the payee to believe the paper was genuine. All the cases cited in the text-books or relied on by the appellant, while they criticise the rule as harsh, only make the particular case under consideration an exception to the rule, and permit the recovery by the drawee for the reason that the holder of the paper receiving the money was himself neglectful, and caused the loss, or by his conduct made the drawee believe the paper was genuine. These cases are exceptions to the rule, but all recognize the doctrine that where the parties are equally innocent the drawee paying the money must suffer the loss. The two cases—one found in 22 Neb. 769, of First Nat. Bank v. State Bank, and the other of People's Bank v. Franklin Bank (Tenn.) 6 L. R. A. 724,—go further in discarding the rule than any cases to which our attention has been called; but in those cases the banks upon which the checks were drawn were permitted to recover upon the ground that the banks paying the checks had neglected to make the proper inquiry as to the identity of the holder, who was a stranger, and that this was such a want of precaution as deprived the bank advancing the money of any superior equity as against the bank upon which the checks were drawn. The court expressly says in the Nebraska case that the loss may therefore be traced directly to the negligence of the plaintiff in error.

Whether the facts of those cases justified the conclusion reached is not necessary to inquire, as, after a careful review of all the authorities, it is found that the general doctrine fixing the liability on the drawee in such cases is fully sustained.

In the case of Espy v. First Nat. Bank, reported in 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 604 [21 L. ed. 947], the money was paid on a raised check, neither party being in fault. It was held that the money could be recovered back as having been paid without consideration. The principle involved in the case being considered was not discussed in that case, nor could it have been well applied, as the bank paying the money could not be presumed to have had knowledge of the fraud practiced by the holder in raising the amount of the check that had been given by its regular depositor.

We find no court as rigid in adhering to the rule that a bank is bound to know the signature of its depositor on this kind of paper as the Supreme Court of the United States.

In Lery v. Bank of U. S. 1 Binn. 27, a forged check, drawn on a bank was accepted and carried to the credit of the holder when the fraud was discovered, in a few hours after, and it was held that the bank was the loser. And the Supreme Court in the case of Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Georgia, when discussing the doctrine that the acceptor is presumed to know the drawer's handwriting, said: "After some research, we have not been able to find a single case in which the general doctrine thus asserted has been shaken, or even doubted; and the diligence of the counsel for the defendants on the present occasion has not been more successful than our own."

In the case cited, reported in 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 333 [6 L. ed. 334], the Bank of Georgia issued originally the bank notes that when put in circulation were fraudulently altered. The Bank of the United States, coming into possession of the notes, presented them to the Bank of Georgia, and the latter received them as genuine, placing the amount to the credit of the United States Bank. The forgery was discovered, and the Bank of Georgia claimed that the Bank of the United States should lose the money. The court held that the Georgia Bank must lose, as it was bound to know its own paper.

There is a manifest distinction between the last-named case and that of Espy v. First Nat. Bank, reported in 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 604 [21 L. ed. 947]. In the case of Espy, if the Cincinnati bank had recognized the name of the drawer as genuine, it could not well have known that the check had been raised. It was not the bank's own check, but that of another; and while, as between parties equally innocent, it is presumed to know the signature of its regular customer on the class of paper in question, it is not presumed to know that the amount is all correct, or that no fraud has been perpetrated in that regard.

While it rests upon one signing his own name, or that of a bank affixing its signature, to notes to pass as current money, to know that the signature is genuine, it also rests on a bank, where checks are drawn upon it in the name of its customer, to know his signature; and instead of the party to whom the money is paid being required to show negligence in the bank paying the money, it devolves on the drawee to show negligence in the indorser or holder who in good faith has received the money before the drawee can escape liability. When the parties are equally innocent the drawee is the loser. There is no precedent in this court on the question. Still, we are not inclined to follow the views of text-writers, in the face of so many adjudications on the subject, and with no case presented that goes further than to modify the rule in cases where bad faith or negligence is to be attributed to the holder or indorsee when taking the check. Besides, it appears from the finding of facts in this case that Burgess, the real depositor, and whose name has been forged, lived near Georgetown, in which the appellant is located, and was one of its largest depositors. These checks were continued to be paid during a period of nearly five months before the forgery was discovered,—a fact, it seems to us, that should be decisive of this case; and while the appellant, by its officers, was acting all the while in the best of faith, believing that the signature of Burgess was genuine, the length of time these checks were being received for collection, and paid without question, by the appellant, must necessarily fix the responsibility where it was placed by the court below.

The judgment denying the right of recovery by the appellant is therefore affirmed.

son & Co., Implunder, etc., Resp.

1. The title to commercial paper payable on demand which is sent by one bank to another for collection and so indorsed, does not pass to the latter bank prior to its collection, although it is accompanied by a letter stating that it is sent "for collection and credit" and its amount is credited upon the account of the transmitting bank immediately upon its receipt by the collecting bank in pursuance of a custom existing between the two banks in regard to their dealings.
2. The assignee of a bank holding such paper uncollected takes no title thereto, and if he collects the same it is his duty to remit the proceeds to the transmitting bank; and the fact that he has expended such proceeds in the payment of the debts of his assignor in good faith, without notice of the claim of the transmitting bank, and under an order of court for the payment of a dividend to creditors, is no defense to a suit by the latter to recover them.
3. As to the proceeds of the paper collected by the bank before its assignment and paid out by it in the usual course of its business in payment of its debts, the transmitting

If a bank to whom paper indorsed in blank is sent for collection has notice that the transmitting bank has no interest in such paper, and that it acted merely as agent in forwarding the paper, the collecting bank cannot retain the proceeds thereof unless advances have been made on the faith of it.

it is indorsed in blank, and the bank merely becomes his agent for its collection. *Balbach v.

A bank receiving from another for collection notes indorsed in blank obtains no better title to them or the proceeds than the remitting bank had, unless it becomes a purchaser for value without it has a general balance against the remitting bank will not constitute it a holder for value. *McLiride

A bank which collects drafts sent to it for col-has been given on the faith of such drafts and there has been no alteration in the situation of the parties because thereof. *Lawrence v. Stonington

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Occurring Special Term in favor of defendant Hubbell in an action to recover the proceeds of certain commercial paper sent to Hubbell's assignor for collection. Reversed.

Statement by Peckham, J.:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the general term, affirming a judgment in favor of the respondent, Hubbell, entered upon the decision of a single judge at special term. The following are the material facts, as found by the justice trying the cause: The plaintiff is a duly constituted banking corporation, located and doing business in the City of New York.

It was held that if bankers discounted a bill so indorsed, for the indorser, who misapplied the proceeds, the bank was liable to the owner of the bill for its amount when paid by the drawee. Stourney v. Lloyd, 8 Barn. & C.
222.

In White v. Miners Nat. Bank, 102 U. S. 692 69 L. ed. 222, the court regards the question of whether or not a restrictive indorsement by the payee of a draft directing payment to the indorser for account of the payee, would transfer the title to the paper as one of first impression and refuses to decide it, but strongly intimates that such indorsement would transfer neither title to the paper nor the ownership of the money when received.

Trover will lie for bills of exchange indorsed to an agent of the plaintiff or order for their account and deposited with the defendants by such agent as a security for past and future advances by the defendants to him. Treutzel v. Barandon, 8 Tauch.
100.

Indorsement specifically "For collection."

An indorsement "For collection," placed upon commercial paper, is notice to all parties subsequently dealing therewith that the owner has not transferred the title thereto, and subsequent holders can only succeed to the rights conferred by the restrictive indorsement. *Bank of Metropolis
v. First Nat. Bank*, 19 Fed. Rep. 201, 22 Hatch. 12;
First Nat. Bank v. Reno Co. Bank, 1 McCrory, 42,
3 Fed. Rep. 227; Lee v. Chittenden Branch Bank, 1
Bond. 227; Clifton v. Wilson, 11 Iowa, 12; *Hoffman
v. First Nat. Bank*, 40 N. J. L. 60; *Thompson v.
Gloucester City Sav. Inst.* (N. J.) 3 Cent. Rep. 222;
Booe v. Prescott, 1 Ark. 222.

The restrictive indorsement is notice that a trust attaches to the paper and the collecting bank becomes liable to the owner if it diverts the proceeds into another channel. Blaine v. Bourne, 11 B. &
L. 12; Cash Bank v. Farmers Bank, 20 Md. 124.

On, and for many years prior to December 9, 1884, the defendants J. Forman and Alfred Wilkinson were copartners, doing business under the firm name of Wilkinson & Co., as private bankers at the City of Syracuse, N. Y. For a number of years prior to December 9, 1884, the plaintiff had been accustomed to forward to the firm of Wilkinson & Co., for collection, checks, drafts and notes belonging to it, and made payable at different places, at the City of Syracuse and vicinity, the firm being the correspondents of the plaintiff in that portion of the State. The course of business pursued by the plaintiff and the firm of Wilkinson & Co. was as follows: The plaintiff upon receiving checks, drafts and notes payable at Syracuse or its vicinity, made upon such paper an indorsement in the following terms:

"Pay Wilkinson & Co., or order for coll. for account of National Butchers & Drovers Bank of the City of New York. W. H. Chase, Cash."

The plaintiff thereupon inclosed said checks, drafts and notes in a letter addressed to the firm of Wilkinson & Co., which was in the following form:

National Butchers & Drovers Bank, N. Y. 188.

Messrs. Wilkinson & Co.

Dear Sirs: Your favor of the — inst. is received, with inclosures, as stated. I inclose for collection and credit bills as stated below.

Respectfully yours,

William H. Chase, Cashier.

Whereupon follows an itemized statement of checks, drafts, etc., naming the bank where payable, the city where such bank is located, and the amount of the checks, drafts, etc. All above the itemized statement in the letter was in print, except the address, "Messrs. Wilkinson & Co." Thereupon the plaintiff, upon its books, charged to Wilkinson & Co. the various drafts, checks, etc., thus forwarded to them, and upon the credit side of their account credited them for whatever moneys were remitted to and received by the plaintiff from Wilkinson & Co. The charges against Wilkinson & Co. were made upon the ledger of the plaintiff day by day, as the checks, drafts, etc., were sent, and on the days they were sent. Upon receipt by Wilkinson & Co. of the checks, drafts, etc., such of them as were payable on demand were immediately, upon their receipt, credited to the account of the plaintiff, kept upon the books of Wilkinson & Co., for their face value. Such paper as was not payable on demand, but had some time to run, was not entered upon the account of the plaintiff until it was actually paid. Such of the checks, bills and notes as were payable at banks of the City of Syracuse were thereupon collected by Wilkinson & Co. through the clearing-house. If any of the paper, however, was protested, it was charged back upon the books of Wilkinson & Co. to the plaintiff, and returned to it, and the expenses of protest charged to plaintiff. Such of the paper received by Wilkinson & Co. from the plaintiff as was payable at banks out of the City of Syracuse was forwarded by

In McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401, the court assumes as a basis for its decision that the proceeds of a draft given to a bank for collection constitute a trust fund which cannot be diverted from the purposes for which the trust was constituted.

Under such indorsement the relation created between the transmitting and receiving bank is merely one of principal and agent, which no act of the agent can change, and the owner of the draft may follow and recover his funds so long as they can be traced and identified. First Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 36 Fed. Rep. 59.

Title to commercial paper received for collection by a bank, and forwarded to its correspondent in the usual course of business, without an express agreement in reference thereto, does not rest in such correspondent, even if he has remitted on general account in anticipation of collection; but title passes only by a contract to that effect, to be expressly proved or inferred from an unequivocal course of dealing. Arnot v. Bingham, 55 Hun, 553, 29 N. Y. S. R. 878.

Such indorsement placed upon paper sent by one bank to another will, in and of itself, make the collecting bank the agent of the transmitting bank, and will prevent the title to the paper or to the proceeds from passing to the collecting bank; but this result is placed beyond all question where there is a contract between the two banks that all paper sent is to be collected and the proceeds transmitted on certain specified days in each month next after collection. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 39 Fed. Rep. 684.

Such indorsement will not pass title.

It seems to be universally held that an indorsement "For collection" will prevent the indorsee from acquiring any valid title to the paper which he can either transfer or rely on as against the true owner.

Such is the New York rule. National Park Bank v. Seaboard Bank, 114 N. Y. 28; Dickerson v. Watson, 47 N. Y. 439; Warner v. Lee, 6 N. Y. 144; People v. Bank of Danville, 30 Hun, 187; Hoffman v. Miller, 9 Bosw. 384.

It has been so held in Pennsylvania. First Nat. Bank v. Gregg, 79 Pa. 384.

And such also is the doctrine held in the following Federal cases: Levi v. Missouri Nat. Bank, 5 Dill. 104; Re Armstrong, 33 Fed. Rep. 406; Fifth Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 40 Fed. Rep. 44.

In Massachusetts it is held that the title passed only so far as to enable the indorsee to demand, receive and sue for the money to be paid. The owner may control his paper until it is paid and may intercept the proceeds thereof in the hands of an intermediate agent. Freeman's Nat. Bank v. National Tube Works (Mass.) 8 L. R. A. —.

In Mississippi it is held that where one bank sends to another a draft for collection, restrictively indorsed, the receiving bank does not become a purchaser of the paper for value, although the forwarding bank is indebted to it on account of collections and has failed after the paper is sent. In such cases the owner of the paper may stop payment thereon or recover the proceeds if it has been paid, although he indorsed it in blank to the transmitting bank. First Nat. Bank v. Strauss, 66 Miss. 479.

In general collecting bank cannot apply proceeds.

A bank receiving a note so indorsed cannot re-

Wilkinson & Co. to their own correspondents at the cities and villages where such payments were to be made, and Wilkinson & Co. received from them the proceeds of such paper when collected. On Thursday of each week Wilkinson & Co. remitted to the plaintiff, by a draft on New York, the amount standing to the credit of the plaintiff upon their books up to that time, less about  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 per cent for their services. These remittances were generally made in the morning, regardless of whether Wilkinson & Co. had at the time actually received the proceeds of all the checks, drafts, etc., which then stood upon its book credited to the plaintiff. This manner of doing business had been carried on for a number of years prior to the failure of Wilkinson & Co., and was understood by the plaintiff, and was the existing arrangement. In pursuance of this arrangement, the plaintiff on and for a number of days prior to December 8, 1884, forwarded to Wilkinson & Co. various drafts, checks and notes, indorsed by the plaintiff in the manner above described, inclosed in letters in the form specified, amounting in all to \$14,260.36, all of which, except time collections amounting to \$488.67, were credited to the plaintiff upon their books. From this total Wilkinson & Co., prior to December 9, 1884, had sent various sums for collection to other agents, leaving a balance of \$13,822.43 to be accounted for. Of this sum there had been paid to and received by Wilkinson & Co., on and prior to December 9, 1884, the sum of \$9,195.50, which sum was received by Wilkinson & Co. in divers sums from December 4 to December 9, 1884, both dates inclusive, and no part of that sum has been paid to the plaintiff but all of it was paid out by Wilkinson & Co. in due course of business before December 9, 1884.

On the 9th of December, 1884, Wilkinson & Co. executed and delivered to the defendant, Charles E. Hubbell, a general assignment for the benefit of their creditors of their property, both real and personal, and Hubbell duly accepted the trust created, and duly qualified as such assignee, and took possession thereunder on the morning of December 10, 1884, said assignment being duly recorded on the 10th day of December, 1884. Between the execution and delivery of the assignment and the 20th of February, 1885, Hubbell, as such assignee, received of the checks, drafts, etc., sent by plaintiff to Wilkinson & Co. the sum of $4,626.83, being the balance of said sum of $13,822.43. The defendant remitted to the plaintiff $488.67 of above amount, being proceeds of time paper sent for collection, as to which a different practice had prevailed, but defendant, Hubbell, as such assignee, refused to pay the balance of said $4,626.83, being the sum of $4,138.16, to the plaintiff.

Prior to a notice of the plaintiff's claim served on defendant, Hubbell, December 26, 1884, he had, as assignee of Wilkinson & Co., received from the entire estate the sum of $10,908.36, which sum included all but $295.48 of the above-named amount, $4,198.16, and the assignee, prior to receiving the notice, tain the proceeds to apply to a balance due from the bank sending it, unless authorized by some course of dealing, or by some other matter outside of the indorsement. Sweeny v. Easter, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 166 (17 L. ed. 681); Stark v. U. S. Nat. Bank, 41 Hun. 508.

A bank which has received from its correspondent a draft indorsed "For collection" which is indorsed in like manner to its correspondent, cannot apply the proceeds to the latter's debt and refuse to pay the owner. City Bank of Sherman v. Weiss, 67 Tex. 331.

Where a draft sent to a bank for collection was paid by the drawee by check, which the bank collected through the clearing house, and a memorandum was placed with the bank's cash to indicate that the proceeds of the draft was the property of the sender, and the next morning the bank was closed and the receiver credited such proceeds to the sender of the draft on the books of the bank, the sender can recover the same, as the fund was not so mingled that it could not be traced and identified. First Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 36 Fed. Rep. 59.

It appears to be well settled that the mere crediting of the amount of the draft upon the account of the transmitting bank will not give the collecting bank any claim thereon prior to its collection, at least if the credit is not an absolute one but is made "subject to payment." Fifth Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 40 Fed. Rep. 46; First Nat. Bank v. Reno Co. Bank, 3 Fed. Rep. 257, 1 McCrary, 491.

It is also held that such crediting of moneys collected on bills and notes remitted for collection does not prevent the real owner of such bills and notes from reclaiming the proceeds in the hands of the collecting banker. Arnold v. Clark, 1 Sandf. 491; Lawrence v. Stonington Bank, 6 Conn. 521. 7 L. R. A.

On the contrary, it has been held in Ohio that the receipt of the proceeds of a draft by a collecting bank, and the entry of such proceeds on its books to the credit of the transmitting bank, which is at the time an apparently solvent institution, and there being no notice but that the draft was its absolute property, is a payment to the transmitting bank which relieves the collecting bank from all liability to the owner of the draft. Reeves v. State Bank, 8 Ohio St. 465.

It is, however, intimated in that case that before the collection of the draft its owner may, by notification to the collecting bank, make it his agent and thereafter control the application of the proceeds. Id. 484.

Effect of advances and overdrafts.

An advance made by a collecting bank on the faith of a draft sent it for collection and so indorsed will give it no right to retain the proceeds thereof as against the true owner. First Nat. Bank v. Bank of Monroe, 38 Fed. Rep. 408.

Where one bank receives from another a draft belonging to a customer, for collection merely, without advancing any money or giving any credit thereon, it has no title to the draft which will authorize it to retain the moneys received thereon, as against the true owner, on account of overdrafts of the remitting bank. Lindauer v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 55 Barb. 75; Dod v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 59 Barb. 285; McBride v. Farmers Bank, 23 Barb. 657; Commercial Bank v. Maine Bank, 1 Trans. App. 803, 3 Keyes, 337.

Absolute credit of amount.

The deposit of a check in a bank, and the credit, with the depositor's consent, of the amount thereof in his pass book as cash, vests title to the check in the bank, and the depositor thereby loses all control over it. Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 30 N. Y. 530.

all others; therefore these restrictive indorsements upon this paper must govern.

This restrictive form of indorsement and forwarding the same for collection has become a part of the law-merchant for the world since the decision in 1701 of Edie v. East India Co., 2 Burr. 1228, and of this custom courts must take judicial notice.

These collections being thus restrictively indorsed by the plaintiff for a specific purpose, such indorsement conferred no title to the same nor to the proceeds thereof, upon Wilkinson & Co., or said Hubbell, but the same remained in the plaintiff.

How subject affected by repudiation of doctrine of sub-agency of collecting bank.

A class of cases of which Hoover v. Wise, 91 U. S. 308 (23 L. ed. 802); Allen v. Merchants Bank, 22 Wend. 215; Montgomery Co. Bank v. Albany City Bank, 7 N. Y. 450; Commercial Bank v. Union Bank, 11 N. Y. 203; Ayrault v. Pacific Bank, 47 N. Y. 570; Mackervy v. Ramsay, 9 Clark & F. 818, and Bradstreet v. Everson, 73 Pa. 124,—are types, have held that the bank to whom a draft is given for collection cannot appoint a sub-agent for the owner, but that its correspondent is its agent for whose conduct it alone is answerable and whose actions it alone can control, and that consequently no privity exists between the owner of the draft and the collecting bank, which will sustain a suit by the former against the latter. The Supreme Court of Ohio in Reeves v. State Bank, 8 Ohio St. 405, applied this doctrine to the right of the owner to recover the proceeds of a collected draft from the collecting bank and refused to permit a recovery. And the same ruling was afterwards made in the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois (Hopkins, J.), Hyde v. First Nat. Bank, 7 Ill. 156; and it has been the ground for one or two recent dissenting opinions by federal judges.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, Hubbell, as one defense to the claim of the plaintiff, insists that Wilkinson & Co., upon the receipt by them of the various checks and drafts or other pieces of paper payable on demand, and upon the crediting of the amounts thereof to the plaintiff upon their books, without waiting for the payment of the same, became the owners thereof, and that these facts amounted to a transfer of the title to the paper or its proceeds to Wilkinson & Co. In that we think he is mistaken. The indorsement upon each piece of paper was for collection simply, and by virtue of that indorsement no title passed to the firm; but, on the contrary, it became simply the agent of the plaintiff to present the paper, demand payment thereof, and remit to it. Under such circumstances, the title to the paper remained in the party sending it. Montgomery Co. Bank v. Albany City Bank, 7 N. Y. 459; Dickerson v. Watson, 47 N. Y. 489; White v. Miners Nat. Bank, 102 U. S. 658 [26 L. ed. 250].

The letter accompanying the inclosures of paper amounted simply to a direction to credit after the collection was made, and up to the time that the funds were actually received by the firm it certainly would make no alteration in the law relative to indorsement for collection only. Nor does the finding of the learned justice at special term as to the custom pursued between the parties alter the law in regard to the title to the paper before the funds arising from the payment thereof were actually received by the firm. The finding shows that the credit was a provisional one only. It was a mere matter of bookkeeping. It would seem to have been more in the form of a memorandum of the different pieces of paper received; because if any were not paid, such as went to protest were at once charged back upon the books of the firm against the plaintiff, and returned to it, with the expenses of protest charged to it. The firm never became absolutely responsible to the plaintiff for the amount of these collections until the collections were actually made, and the proceeds received by them. The property in these different pieces of paper therefore never vested in the firm, and the firm never purchased them or advanced any money upon them. Hence, the firm never owned them. Scott v. Ocean Bank, 23 N. Y. 289; Dickerson v. Watson, supra.

These pieces of paper were undoubtedly subject to the direction of the plaintiff at any time prior to their payment, and it would have been the duty of the firm to have obeyed such direction. The plaintiff could have withdrawn the paper, or made such other disposition of it as seemed to it proper. It might have been liable to pay the firm for the services performed by them; but that had no effect or bearing upon the title to the paper.

The cases relied on by the counsel for the defendant for the purpose of showing title in the firm were decided upon an essentially different state of facts.

In Clark v. Merchants Bank, 2 N. Y. 880, the indorsement was in blank, which the court said prima facie imported a transfer of the title to the note, and that it was not sent for collection merely. Upon looking at the other facts in the Bingham*, 29 N. Y. St. Rep. 872, 55 Hun, 553.

By the law of Mississippi, the duty of a bank receiving commercial paper for collection, in case of nonpayment, is to place the paper in the hands of a notary public, to be proceeded with in such manner as to charge the parties to it and secure the rights of the real owners; and the bank is not liable in such cases for the failure of the notary to perform his duty. Britton v. Nicolls, 104 U. S. 787 (26 L. ed. 917).

The notary is the sub-agent of the owner of the note, and as such is liable to him; he is not the agent of the bank. Ibid.

intended to pass the title. Gardiner, J., in that case said: "The whole fund was, by the course of dealing, and in this instance by the directions of the plaintiffs, treated as cash. It was passed to their credit according to their instructions, and the draft in question was for account." Again he said: "The whole arrangement was one of mutual convenience, and to hold that such drafts were transmitted for collection merely, with no right to a credit, or to draw against them until they were actually paid, is to lose sight of the situation of these brokers, their business and their necessities."

In Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 90 N. Y. 550, the bank received the check from the depositor as a deposit of money, and entered the amount as cash to the credit of the depositor in his bank pass book, which was returned to him. There it was held that the title to the check passed to the bank. It was not received merely for collection. The court, per Danforth, J., said: "It is not disputed that Murray [the depositor] held the check as owner. . . . It was his property, to do with as he pleased. He had held other checks. Some of these he placed in the Troy Bank for collection. Others he deposited, and took credit therefor as cash upon his pass-book. As to the first, he could give and revoke his own directions as often as to his control." There, again, the credit was of so much cash. It was nothing less than the purchase of the check. The indorsement was in blank, and the bank took it as owner.

In Briggs v. Central Nat. Bank, 89 N. Y. 182, the defendant made the First National Bank of Newark its collecting agent. The bank upon which the check was drawn upon its receipt charged the check to the drawer, and credited the defendant with the amount in its account. By the transaction the check was paid to the Newark bank, and it was only necessary for it to remit its collections once a week to the bank in New York, under its agreement. The next day, however, it suspended payment, and, in an action by the person who gave the check to the defendant for collection, it was held that the defendant was liable for the payment thereof, although it had not received the amount from its own agent in Newark. The case is not in the least similar to the one at bar.

In People v. City Bank, 80 N. Y. 539, that bank and the Utica City National Bank each acted as agent for, and kept a running account with the other, the balance being struck once a week, and the bank found indebted remitting the balance due. The crediting of the paper was entirely different, and there was a mutual

If a collecting bank can relieve itself from liability for loss by sending a certificate of deposit issued by another bank to a suitable agent, the agent must be someone other than the bank which is to make the payment. German Nat. Bank v. Duran, 18 Colo. 82.

Proof of a custom of banks to transmit checks drawn on other banks to those banks for collection will not justify a bank in sending a certified check for collection to the bank bound to pay such check. Drovers Nat. Bank v. Anglo Am. Packing etc. Co. (Ill.) 4 West. Rep. 149.

If a bank fail to demand payment of a bill held for collection, it makes the bill its own, and becomes liable for the amount. Ibid.; Bird v. Louisiana State Bank, 98 U. S. 86 (25 L. ed. 414).

Where a letter to a bank states that a note is inclosed therein for collection, the neglect of such bank receiving it to give notice that the note was not found inclosed therein is, if unexplained, equivalent to an admission that the note was received. First Nat. Bank of Dubois v. First Nat. Bank of Williamsport (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 134.

A bank which has received a draft for collection and given credit to the sender for the amount, in the regular course of business, without assuming any title, ownership, interest or property in the draft, and thereafter makes the collection, cannot be held liable to the drawee for any portion of the amount received thereon, although the draft had been raised beyond the original sum, of which both were ignorant at the time of payment, where the collecting bank, when notified of the mistake, had previously paid over to the sender all that was due to the latter on the account between them, including the amount credited for this draft. National Park Bank v. Seaboard Bank, 114 N. Y. 33.

In case of insolvency of collecting bank.

The collecting bank cannot, some time after, pay the amount collected in depreciated currency, but must pay the value of the currency at the time the money was collected by it. Marine Bank v. Fulton Co. Bank, 39 U. S. 2 Wall. 298 (17 L. ed. 705).

Where, at the time of the failure of a bank, it is indebted to its correspondent bank, a portion of which indebtedness had been collected by the latter on drafts of other banks sent to it by the failing bank, to which the proceeds had been credited, the correspondent bank should be allowed to prove its claims, and the receiver be allowed to accept the proof and pay a dividend on the claim presented. Elkhart First Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 89 Fed. Rep. 322.

Where a bank in New Orleans remitted to a foreign banking firm bills of exchange for collection, and then failed, such firm cannot recover of the receiver of the bank the 10 per cent damages allowed by the laws of Louisiana upon protest of foreign bills of exchange, in addition to the expenses of protest. Hambro v. Casey, 110 U. S. 216 (25 L. ed. 125).

A bank received a cashier's check of another bank as a conditional payment of a debt of a third party; the latter bank made an assignment in trust for creditors, and the check was not paid upon presentation. At the time of the assignment there was, upon the books of the first bank, a credit to the insolvent bank of the proceeds of notes indorsed and discounted for the latter's accommodation. In an action by the first bank against the debtor, for the debt, it was held, that this deposit was not a valid set-off against the debt. Union Nat. Bank v. Canonsburgh Iron Co. (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 222.

Where the money is allowed to remain for months with the collecting bank, which meantime becomes insolvent, the bank for which the collection was made will be treated as an ordinary creditor. Philadelphia Nat. Bank v. Dowd (N. C.) 2 L. R. A. 400.

Where a collecting bank under contract has a right to mingle collections with its own funds, that right ceases on its insolvency. See note to Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank (Mass.) 2 L. R. A. 609.

account current between the banks. All that case holds, however, is that when the moneys were paid the relation between the banks was simply that of debtor and creditor. We cannot see, therefore, that as to the paper not actually collected, and the cash received by Wilkinson & Co. before their failure, it ever became the property of that firm, or that the title to the proceeds thereof ever vested in that firm or its assignee. As to the moneys received by the firm in payment of checks and drafts sent to it for collection by the plaintiff, and by the firm paid out before the assignment, and in the usual course of business, in payment of the debts of the firm, and of course never received by the assignee, we do not see that the plaintiff occupies any different position in that regard towards the firm than any other creditor. As the firm was to remit but once a week, of course it was not expected that the identical moneys received by it in payment of paper sent to it for collection were to be sent to the plaintiff. The firm, by the arrangement, had the right to retain the moneys, and to remit weekly; and of course from one week to another it had the right to use the money, and the plaintiff relied upon the credit of the firm for such time as it had the right to retain the money.

But it is claimed on the part of the defendant assignee that, assuming that no title to the checks passed to Wilkinson & Co., the plaintiff is not entitled to recover so far as regards the proceeds of the paper that were received by the assignee, and expended by him in good faith, and without notice by him of any claim on the part of the plaintiff prior to the making of the demand, or the service of the notice by the plaintiff upon him. We think this claim cannot be maintained. In the first place, the moneys received by the assignee, as proceeds of the paper sent by the plaintiff to the firm for collection, and not collected by the firm before the assignment, never became the property of that firm, and therefore the legal title never passed to the assignee of the firm. It was not transferred by the firm to the assignee, because at the time when the assignment was made the money had not been collected, and had not come into the hands of the assignors. It never came into the hands of the assignee by virtue of the assignment, in any legal sense of the term. The moneys came to him from the various collecting agents to whom the drafts and checks had been sent by the firm. The assignee could get no better title to the moneys than his assignor, and neither had any right to apply such moneys collected after the failure to the payment of firm debts. If it be said that he received and applied them in good faith, it may be answered that good faith did not change the title of the plaintiff to the proceeds of its property.

There are cases in which an assignee or trustee is protected for acts done in good faith under an instrument creating the trust, and before such instrument had been declared invalid. Where an assignee, under an assignment for the benefit of creditors, fraudulent upon its face, pays money to bona fide creditors of the assignor in accordance with the directions of the assignment, he will be protected, provided he does it in good faith, and before any other creditor has obtained a lien upon the money. This is because the assignment, as between the parties to it, is valid, and the assignee, in making such payment, is doing no more than the assignor might at that time lawfully have done if no assignment had been made. In such case all that can be said is, if the assignment be declared void, that the assignor paid certain of his creditors indirectly, and through the agency of the assignee, at a time when he had the right to do it directly, but for the assignment.

Such was the case of Ames v. Blunt, 5 Paige, 18, where the chancellor said that the liability of the assignee depended upon the question whether the rights of the plaintiff had been affected by the distribution of the proceeds of the assigned property to bona fide creditors of the assignor; and it was held that the plaintiff was not thereby injured, because the assignee had done no more than the assignor might have done at any time before the plaintiff obtained a lien upon the money paid by the assignee. To the same effect are the cases of Collumb v. Read, 24 N. Y. 505; Averill v. Loucks, 6 Barb. 470, 477; Iddings v. Bruen, 4 Sandf. Ch. 252, 258.

The case of Sullivan v. Miller, 106 N. Y. 635, 9 Cent. Rep. 477, is also an instance of the same general principle. In that case the property belonged to the assignor, and was assigned to the assignee subject to a mortgage. The action of the assignee, or his successor, the receiver, was upheld by the court. The title to the property was in the assignor. It was not property of a third person, which he disposed of.

It is argued, also, that as this property came honestly into the possession of the assignee, the plaintiff would have to prove a demand upon, and a refusal by, him to give it up before an action could be maintained; and it is then claimed that where such an assignee, before notice has been given to him, or any demand made upon him for a surrender of the property, has disposed of the same in good faith, he is relieved from liability. The cases cited by counsel are those where property has come into the hands of the assignor tortiously, and under such circumstances that, as between him and the original owner, the latter could insist upon his title. In such case, where possession of the property is given to the assignee under the assignment, it is held that, he having innocently come into possession of the same, before an action can be maintained against him, demand must be made for the surrender of the property. Such is the case of property obtained by the assignor by fraudulent representations, where the vendor has the right to rescind the contract and take back the property. Barnard v. Campbell, 68 N. Y. 73; Goodwin v. Wertheimer, 99 N. Y. 149. But in such case the legal title is in the assignor at the time he makes the assignment, and that title passing to the assignee, who is innocent of the fraud, a demand by the vendor must be made before an action for its recovery can be maintained.

The case of Hagerty v. Palmer, 6 Johns. Ch. 487, is of a similar nature. The legal title to the property was in the assignor, and the assignee took it. If disposed of by him to a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, the vendee might be protected, and the assignee, also, if he sold before he himself had any notice. Here the property was never the property of the assignor.

It never came to the assignee by virtue of the assignment, in any legal acceptance of that term. Indeed, he must have known that the property did not belong to the assignor; at least, an inspection of their books would have shown, as it seems to us, enough to put him upon inquiry as to where the title to these moneys rested. It did not rest with the assignor, and it could transfer none to its assignee. Again, we do not think that the order of the county court or the county judge for the payment of the dividend was the least protection to the assignee. That order did not assume to say what moneys should be used in the payment of the dividend. It did not assume to decide whether these moneys were the moneys of the assignor. That question was not before the court. It simply gave directions to the assignee to pay a certain dividend, upon papers which it is to be presumed showed to the court or judge that the assignee claimed to have moneys enough of the assignor in his hands at the time to pay it with. But, even if it had assumed to direct that these particular moneys should be paid, we see no protection thereby given to the assignee. The plaintiffs could not be concluded upon a question as to the title to their property by any ex parte decision of the county judge.

The case of Herring v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 105 N. Y. 875, 7 Cent. Rep. 808, has nothing to do with the point. The plaintiff here was no lienor of property in the possession of the assignee. It was, as we have seen, the absolute owner of it, and it could not be divested of its title without some notice.

Lastly, the claim is made that the plaintiff has been guilty of laches in asserting its rights, and that therefore the payment made by the assignee in ignorance of the existence of its claim is to be protected. If laches were a defense, we see no facts upon which their existence can be founded. The plaintiff heard of the assignment of Wilkinson & Co., at the earliest, not before December 10, 1884, and on the 26th the demand on its behalf for these moneys was made of the assignee. It seems that under an ex parte order of the county court or judge, made on the 23d of December, he had already paid out a large part of this money. It would be a pretty stern application of the doctrine of laches to hold that a plaintiff should be deprived of all title to its property by reason of not making a demand for it, of an assignee of a third person for the benefit of creditors, within less than sixteen days after it heard of the assignment, and where it had no reason to suppose that the assignee would take its property to pay the debts of the assignors. The defense of laches is not made out.

Whether the funds, if there are any, in the hands of the assignee, collected by him since the service of the notice and the demand, should be impressed with a trust to reimburse the plaintiff the amount of its property used to pay the debts of the assignors, we do not now decide. We should want more facts before us. We should, among other things, want to know whether any liens had been acquired by any other creditor upon such moneys, and under what circumstances, so as to be able to decide understandingly as between different claimants to such funds. Perhaps other parties would have to be brought in. Upon the whole, we think the assignee is liable to account to the plaintiff for the moneys received by him subsequent to the 9th day of December, 1884, being the proceeds of the checks or drafts above referred to.

It results from these views that the judgment of the General and Special Terms should be reversed as to the assignee, and a new trial granted against him, with costs to abide the event.

UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS.

Charlotte A. WADDELL, Exr., etc., of William C. H. Waddell, Deceased, UNITED STATES.

(25 Ct. Cl. R. ....)

1. The Court of Claims has no jurisdiction to render judgment in favor of a claim

NOTE.—Court of claims; limitation of time to present claims.

Claims against the United States in the court of claims are barred by statute unless filed within six years after claim accrues. Clark v. United States, 99 U. S. 488 (25 L. ed. 481); Kendall v. United States, 107 U. S. 123 (27 L. ed. 437). See Nichols v. United States, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 126 (19 L. ed. 127).

They are barred within six years after suit could be commenced thereon against the government. Finn v. United States, 123 U. S. 227 (31 L. ed. 123).

Judgment holding an action brought on a claim against the United States under a special Act more than six years thereafter to be barred,—affirmed by a divided court. Rice v. United States, 122 U. S. 611 (30 L. ed. 793).

The clause of Rev. Stat., § 1059, which invests the court of claims with jurisdiction of claims referred to it by either House of Congress, is subject to other clauses defining its jurisdiction and fixing the 7 L. R. A.

against the United States which accrued more than six years before the filing of the petition.

2. Public officers cannot open and re-examine claims against the government which were rejected by their predecessors in office, in the absence of fraud, mistake in matters of fact arising from errors in calculation or of newly discovered material evidence.

period within which all claims must be asserted against the United States. Ford v. United States, 118 U. S. 213 (29 L. ed. 608).

The petitioner's right to sue in the court of claims under § 1059, 1062, did not accrue until the accounting officers held him liable for the sum lost, by refusing to credit his account therewith. United States v. Clark, 96 U. S. 37 (24 L. ed. 690).

Where a petition in the court of claims shows that the claim is barred by six years' lapse of time, it may be dismissed on demurrer. Kendall v. United States, 107 U. S. 123 (27 L. ed. 437).

Where the government, although a nominal plaintiff, has no real interest in the litigation, the defense of the Statute of Limitations is available as between individuals. United States v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 838 (38 L. ed. 121).

A judgment in the court of claims for a claim which the record shows to be barred by statute is erroneous. Finn v. United States, supra.

of a distress warrant, which accrued more than forty-seven years before it was presented to the Treasury Department, is a stale claim which the accounting officers have no right to receive, examine or settle.

(April 21, 1893.)

CLAIMS for money alleged to be due to a former United States marshal, transmitted for the opinion of the court by the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives and by the Secretary of the Treasury. Judgment against claimant.

Mr. George A. King for claimant
Messrs William H. H. Miller, Atty-Gen.,
and John C. Chaney, Asst. Atty-Gen., for the United States.

The court made the following findings of facts:

I. The claimant is executrix of the estate of William C. H. Waddell, deceased.

II. Said W. C. H. Waddell was appointed marshal of the United States for the Southern District of New York by Andrew Jackson, President, and by that appointment and re-appointment held the office from November 7, 1881, to December 10, 1889, when his last commission expired.

III. In 1846 the claimant's testator (W. C. H. Waddell) presented to the Treasury Department for adjustment and payment accounts for fees, disbursements, cartage, labor, storage, insurances and other costs in cases in which the United States were a party, which costs had previously been taxed and allowed by the District Judge of the United States for the Southern District of New York. These accounts were examined by the accounting officers, and on the 7th day of April, 1851, the sum of $3,820.42 was allowed and subsequently paid, and the balance, $10,927.04, was disallowed by the first comptroller. No further action was taken for the collection of the claim until December 5, 1885, when it was again presented to the Treasury Department for payment by the attorney of the present claimant as executrix.

Another claim is thus stated in the petitions:

"Fees, expenses and poundage upon the service of a warrant of distress issued by the solicitor of the treasury in the nature of a ca. sa. et f. fa., dated November 12, 1838, against Samuel Swartwout, late collector of customs for the Port of New York, for the sum of $1,844,119 ..... $18,102.83."

This last mentioned claim was never presented to the Treasury Department until December 5, 1885, when, with the other accounts, it was sent to the department and payment demanded by said attorneys of the present claimant. No allegations are made of fraud, mistake in matters of fact arising from errors in calculation or newly discovered material evidence.

Conclusions of law. Upon the prayer for judgment in the amended petition in Departmental Case No. 22, the claimant's amended petition must be dismissed on the ground that the claims are barred by the provisions of section 1069 of the Revised Statutes.

The first claim of $10,927.04 cannot be re-examined by the present accounting officers re-opened except for fraud, manifest mistake in matters of fact arising from an error in calculation, or newly discovered material evidence.

The second claim for $18,102.83 cannot be considered by the accounting officers because it is a stale claim which accrued, if at all, more than forty-seven years before its presentation to the Treasury Department.

Richardson, M. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before us under three distinct provisions of the statutes conferring jurisdiction upon the court.

1. June 5, 1834, it was transmitted by the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives for a finding of fact by the court under section one of the Bowman Act of March 3, 1833, chap. 116 (29 Stat. at L. 485). In that case the claimant filed her petition April 20, 1835.

2. April 8, 1836, it was transmitted by the secretary of the Treasury, under section 2 of that Act, for finding of facts, conclusions of law and opinion. In that case the claimant filed her petition April 20, 1836.

3. After the passage of the Act of March 3, 1837, chap. 250 (24 Stat. at L. 505), the claimant filed an amended petition in the latter case, which, after setting out the allegations of facts relied upon, prays that the court will find, as a conclusion of law, that there is due the claimant the sum of $32,808.79, and that the court will thereupon proceed to render judgment in her favor for that amount in accordance with the provisions of section 12 of the latter Act. That section is as follows:

"Sec. 12. That in every case which shall come before the court of claims, or is now pending therein, under the provisions of an Act entitled 'An Act to Afford Assistance and Relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the Investigation of Claims and Demands against the Government,' approved March 3d, eighteen hundred and eighty-three, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court, upon the facts established, that it has jurisdiction to render judgment or decree thereon under existing laws or under the provisions of this Act, it shall proceed to do so, giving to either party such further opportunity for hearing as in its judgment justice shall require, and report its proceedings therein to either House of Congress or to the department by which the same was referred to said court."

There are two claims in the case transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, differing somewhat in the principles of law to which they give rise.

The first is a claim presented to the department and disallowed more than thirty-five years ago by the predecessors of the present accounting officers, who were asked, after that lapse of time, to pass upon and allow it, without allegations of fraud, mistake or newly discovered evidence.

The second claim accrued, if at all, more than forty-seven years before it was presented to the Treasury Department, December 5, 1885.

Both claims are barred by the Revised Statutes, § 1059, from the jurisdiction of the court to render judgment, as they accrued, if at all, more than six years before the filing of the petition, and section 18 of the Act of 1887 authorizes a judgment in petitions under that Act or the Act of 1883 (the Bowman Act) only when "it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court, upon the facts established, that it has jurisdiction to render judgment or decree thereon under existing laws or under the provisions of this Act." There is no provision in the Act itself for judgment in such case, and the pre-existing law forever barred the claims. The amended petition must therefore be dismissed.

The two claims cannot be received, examined and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury for other reasons not alike in relation to each claim.

The first claim, disallowed more than thirty-five years ago, has passed beyond the control of the accounting officers and the head of the department who have been appointed since the time of that disallowance. The law has been too well settled to be in doubt at this time, that public officers cannot open and re-examine cases decided by their predecessors except for fraud, mistake in matters of fact arising from errors in calculation or newly discovered material evidence. United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 401 [10 L. ed. 783]; La-valette's Case, 1 Ct. Cl. 149; Jackson v. U. S. 19 Ct. Cl. 504; Illinois v. U. S. 20 Ct. Cl. 342; Day v. U. S. 21 Ct. Cl. 262; Collins' Line of Steamships, 9 Ops. Atty-Gen. 84; Beals & Dizon's Claim, 12 Ops. Atty-Gen. 172; Chorpenning's Case, Id. 358; Western Pac. R. Co's Case, 18 Ops. Atty-Gen. 387; McGoon's Case, Id. 456; Internal Revenue Case, 14 Ops. Atty-Gen. 275.

The second claim, which accrued, if at all, in 1888, was not presented to the Treasury Department until December 5, 1885, a period of forty seven years. It is therefore a stale claim, which the accounting officers have no right to receive, examine and settle. It was not the purpose of Congress by the Bowman Act and the Act of 1887 to open and revive stale claims, but rather to provide for a judicial investigation of live and open accounts which are within the cognizance of the accounting officers, and for the determination of other matters. McClure v. U. S. 19 Ct. Cl. 18.

It has often been said that there is no Statute of Limitation applicable to claims required to be presented and examined by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and that is undoubtedly so. But there is an unwritten law recognized by courts of equity and admiralty in which no Statute of Limitation is applicable, against entertaining and enforcing stale claims (Speidel v. Henri, 120 U. S. 887 [80 L. ed. 719], and numerous cases there cited; Willard v. Dorr, 8 Mason, 161), and that law the accounting officers may rightly invoke and rely upon.

A stale claim is one that has not been presented for payment for a long period of time, during which the claimant has slept upon his rights and thus created a presumption that the claim was never an honest and just one, and that he has been waiting until it was forgotten by the alleged debtor, and all evidence against it is lost or destroyed. Courts of equity usually follow the law and adopt the Statutes of Limitation as fixing the period beyond which delay requires explanation, and which, unless satisfactorily accounted for, will constitute a bar to demands. We see no reason why the accounting officers may not rightly adopt the same rule.

But there is much indebtedness of the United States which no lapse of time in making application for payment renders stale, such as interest on registered bonds and other balances stated in favor of parties on the books of the Treasury Department, as to which the only proof to be made is the identity of the claimant or his right to represent the record-creditor (Rev. Stat. §§ 806-808, Hall's Case, 17 Ct. Cl. 39), the public debt evidenced by bonds and coupons of record in the department, and, no doubt, other indebtedness of like kind which we have not considered.

The clerk will certify the findings of fact and conclusions of law and opinion to the Treasury Department for its guidance and action, will certify the findings of fact with this opinion to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, and will enter judgment in the case transmitted to the court by the Secretary of the Treasury (Departmental, No. 28) dismissing the amended petition.

RÉSUMÉ OF THE DECISIONS PUBLISHED IN THIS BOOK.

SUBJECTS Discussed and Points Decided During the Third Quarter of the Judicial Year, Beginning with Oct., 1889, Classified as Follows.

- I. GOVERNMENTAL AND POLITICAL RELATIONS.
- II. CONTRACTUAL RELATIONS.
- III. COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.
- IV. FIDUCIARY RELATIONS.
- V. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.
- VI. PROPERTY RIGHTS AND REMEDIES.
- VII. DAMAGES FOR TORTS.
- VIII. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

I. GOVERNMENTAL AND POLITICAL RELATIONS.

State power of eminent domain. Although the determination of the Legislature is not conclusive that a purpose is a public use, yet, if the use is public, it is conclusive that the necessity exists. (Mass.) 151. Legislative Acts which provide for taking flats in a harbor for improving the harbor are not unconstitutional as authorizing a taking for a use not public. Id. Owners of lands taken are not, by merely petitioning for damages, estopped from disputing the validity of the taking. Id. An abutting owner has an easement in a street which cannot be taken away, even by the Legislature, without compensation. (N. C.) 548. The damages to such owners, by the destruction of their easements for ingress and egress and for the free circulation of light and air, by the construction of an elevated railroad, are consequential, and the jury may consider benefits as well as injuries. (N. Y.) 289. In an action by a lessee to recover damages, the rental value of the property is an element to consider. Id. The construction of a telegraph line on a railroad's right of way imposes an additional servitude for which the owners are entitled to compensation. (Minn.) 121. Whatever injuriously affects the property may be considered as additional expense and loss, the cost of new appliances for continuing the business, etc. Id. A condemnation by a railroad corporation of the upland abutting upon the water embraces the incidental riparian right of improvement of the submerged lands. (Minn.) 722.

Taxation. By the Constitution all property is compelled to be taxed according to its true value in money, and by a uniform rule. (N. C.) 589. "Property" includes moneys, credits, investments and other choses in action. Id. But securities in the actual possession and control of a nonresident trustee, the beneficiaries also being nonresident, are not taxable. (N. Y.) 407. The board of equalization cannot include money, notes or mortgages not within the State. (Or.) 449. In proceedings before the board the rules of practice in civil actions do not apply; so notice to a taxpayer of a proposed increase of assessment need not specify the property to be added. Id. Where a taxpayer appears pursuant to notice, a reply to his answer need not be filed. Id. The separate classification of railroad property, and a separate tribunal for valuation and assessment of such property, are not unconstitutional. (Ark.) 874. Nor does a provision for different intervals of time for making assessments of the respective classes of such property violate the Constitution. Id. The time and place of meeting of the board being provided by statute, notice thereof need not be given; and the failure to provide for an appeal does not render the Act void. Id. A schoolhouse in the City of New York, the property of a religious society, is not exempt from taxation if the society be unincorporated. (N. Y.) 70. The designation of a person against whom a tax warrant is issued by a wrong name will not excuse the collector's failure to collect. (Ne.) 463.

Police power. The State under its police power may require railroad employes to be examined as to their fitness for their service. (Ala.) 266. A statutory liquor bond which must be approved by the town board, and then filed, becomes operative on its approval and before filing, so as to make the sureties liable. (Mich.) 740. If dated back several days before signing, it covers the period from its date. Id. The sureties thereon are estopped to deny their liability by a recital that the principal then professes to carry on the business. Id. The taking of fish with nets in specified waters may be prohibited by the Legislature, and the setting of nets be declared a public nuisance. (N. Y.) 184. The public remedy for abatement of a nuisance by judicial prosecution in rem or in personam is not exclusive where a summary remedy given by statute is appropriate to the object to be accomplished. Id. Where the location or use of personal property interferes with or obstructs a public right or regulation the Legislature may authorize its summary abatement by executive agencies, without judicial proceedings, and the destruction of nets set out to catch fish interferes with no legal right. Id. A state statute prohibiting the sale of goods by hawkers or peddlers is not void as a regulation of commerce. (Pa.) 667.

commissioners do not usurp judicial functions, or exercise judicial powers; and the possibility that the court may be influenced by them does not affect the question of constitutionality of the Act. Id. Consent of parties is sufficient to give jurisdiction over them if the court has jurisdiction of the subject matter; and the filing of pleadings and appearance by the parties is a waiver of process. (Mich.) 511. The right of citizens of other States to bring suit in a state court is guaranteed and protected by the Federal Constitution; and the court has no discretion to refuse to hear the cause. Id. The Statute prescribing the counties within which a railroad company may be sued relates solely to the jurisdiction of the person. Like a natural person it may submit itself to the jurisdiction. (Ohio) 701. A court of law having equity jurisdiction cannot exercise it without pleadings suitable for the purpose. (Ga.) 143.

United States Court of Claims. The court of claims has no jurisdiction to render judgment in favor of a claim which accrued more than six years before the filing of the petition. (U. S. Ct. Cl.) 861. In the absence of fraud or mistake in fact, public officers cannot re-examine claims rejected by their predecessors. Id. A claim of a United States marshal, which accrued more than forty-seven years before it was presented, is a stale claim, and should not be received or examined. Id.

Municipal corporations. The section of a statute requiring notice of resolution to make improvements does not contemplate a committee to hear and determine objections, provisions for this purpose being made in another section. (Ind.) 681. One who signed the agreement authorizing the improvement cannot question the assessment therefor. Id. The validity of bonds or certificates to raise funds to construct the same is not affected by the constitutional limitation of indebtedness of such corporations; and where a portion of the expense is to be paid in cash no indebtedness can be said to be incurred. Id. Where a city contracts for construction of waterworks, a property owner may sue in his own name for damages for breach of the contract, and the contractor will be liable for damages to property by fire, resulting from his neglect to furnish the stipulated amount of water, unless excused under the terms of the contract. (Ky.) 77. The question in such action is whether the fire could have been prevented had defendant performed his contract. Id. Municipalities cannot borrow money for municipal purposes unless expressly authorized to do so by statute, or unless such power is implied. (N.Y.) 759. The power to raise money does not include the power to borrow. Id. Where its charter gives it power to establish and control market houses, a city has power to forbid the selling of fresh meats elsewhere than at market houses established by it. (Tex.) 797. A license to keep a private meat market may be withdrawn, and a person is not deprived of his property by an ordinance forbidding private markets within certain limits. Id. Denying the privilege to sell meats in a city except at certain places is not void as in restraint of trade. Id. A city is not bound to make a chemical analysis of the water of free public wells where it has no notice of its unwholesomeness, and is not liable for injuries caused by drinking therefrom. (N.Y.) 592. A municipal corporation is liable for injuries to a land owner, caused by the negligent backing up of water in a drain which he has a right to maintain. (Mass.) 156. A municipal agency incorporated for the protection of the city, and without means of raising money by taxation, i. e., waterworks commissioners, is not liable for negligence of its servants. (Mich.) 170. A city is not liable for a privilege tax on waterworks, which are its corporate property; nor can the question of its liability be determined in a suit to recover back money paid under protest, as the amount of the tax depends on population. (Tenn.) 469.

Counties. A new county cannot discharge its debt by delivery of its bonds; it must convert them into cash and pay the debt. (Mont.) 105. Commissioners derive their power from the law alone, not from the county; and when the Legislature directs the county to pay money their refusal to act constitutes a case of money "withheld by an unreasonable and vexatious delay," and the county will be liable for interest for their failure to take action. Id. But when the law itself imposes a duty on them, and they are not appointed thereto by the county, the county will not be responsible for their breach of duty or nonfeasance or misfeasance. Id. Fees of a county attorney may be taxed in a proceeding by writ of mandate, and the balance only can be taxed in his favor where the percentage allowed would make a total more than he is entitled to by law. Id. A contract by the commissioners with a legal adviser for a term extending beyond the period of their term of office is against public policy and void. (Ind.) 180.

Towns. A town may employ counsel to oppose a petition for the division of its territory, and its vote is not necessary to authorize incurring expense for this purpose. (Conn.) 776. A town council has no power to appropriate funds to aid in building a county court-house; and taxpayers may by suit prevent town officers from misapplying town funds. (Ark.) 180. Equity has jurisdiction to cancel warrants drawn and unpaid, and to compel repayment of money paid, and annul an illegal appropriation. Id. Where members of a town council vote an appropriation for their own benefit it is a conversion of trust funds for which each will be liable. Id. A town or village authorized to incorporate for school purposes cannot be extended to an inordinate size. (Tex.) 723. Where the inhabitants voted that a person might purchase from Indians, the town is estopped, many years after acquiescence in the limits and bounds of his patent, from disputing his title to the land purchased. (N.Y.) 755. Citizens can be taxed only for lawful public purposes; and a town cannot vote a tax to reimburse a collector who has improperly taken a note for taxes. (Me.) 463. The expiration of a license given to a town to maintain a drain over lands of the licensor will not relieve the town from liability for injuries caused by the subsequent obstruction of the drain whose use is continued the same after as before the license expired. (Mass.) 156.

Street improvements. Taxes and assessments for street improvements must be paid by the life tenant. (Md.) 532. Chancery cannot order sale of city real estate for such taxes and assessments upon joint petition of the life tenant and infant remainderman, and the Legislature cannot validate a judicial sale without a provision for compensating the owners. Id. Stub receipt books in the city treasurer's office (Mich. 824), and books of the receiver of taxes handed over to the city treasurer, are public records which an abstract maker has a right to inspect. (Mich.) 78.

Street railroads. Power given to a railroad company by the Legislature to construct and operate its road in the streets of a town or city is independent of the municipality. (Pa.) 869. The adoption of a narrow gauge will not prevent it thereafter adopting any ordinary gauge. Id. The notice to abutters of the purpose to lay its tracks does not require a designation of the motive power to be used; and a location under an ordinance permitting horse power is not affected by permitting the use of electricity by means of any system of application approved as suitable; and courts will not take judicial notice that such use is dangerous. (R. I.) 205. The use of electricity is not an imposition of an additional servitude. Id. The building by a railroad company of a side track in a street on its right of way constitutes no additional burden upon property abutting upon the street. (Ind.) 257.

Private corporations. The secretary of a corporation is chargeable with knowledge of its by laws (N. Y. 822); and a by-law providing for the removal of officers by the board of directors is a part of the contract of employment. Id. A by law providing that when a director shall die or otherwise create a vacancy in the board, it may proceed to supply the vacancy, does not authorize the board to create a vacancy, nor oust a director who is nonresident. (Pa.) 857. Regulations as to stockholders voting, and voting by proxy, are reasonable and uniform in operation. Id. When a corporation is made the agent of another it acts through the same instrumentalities as when acting for itself and has capacity to execute a deed as attorney in fact. (Or.) 683. Where it invests an agent with general authority the declarations of that agent are competent evidence against his principal. (Ind.) 214. A corporation violating the Organic Law forfeits its franchise, but is not thereby subject to the escheat or confiscation of its property. (Pa.) 684. A foreign corporation owning all the stock of a domestic corporation does not thereby "acquire or hold" the real estate so as to violate the Act prescribing the penalty of escheat. Id. The penalty of escheat is removed as to land in the possession of owners having the right to hold the same. Id.

Who may be stockholders. A resident alien and property holder may become a stockholder entitled to vote for and be elected as a director. (Pa.) 860. Nonresidents take their shares with all the rights and privileges of citizens, and may become directors. (Pa.) 857. They may become stockholders of corporations for the promotion of agriculture, etc., in the absence of any charter prohibition. Id.

Stockholders' liabilities. The agreement to take stock is not enforceable until the subscriber has acknowledged the articles of association. (Ind.) 591. A stockholder's liability to creditors, under the Statute, is not penal, and survives his death. (N. Y.) 553. Any attempt of the general manager to release him from his liabilities, where no attempt is made to transfer his shares, will not avail; nor will such attempt be aided by issue of stock to new subscribers; and the fact that he was misled by the manager's statements will not relieve him from his liability, as a mistake of law does not relieve in equity any more than at law. Id. The assignee of a corporation is not estopped from enforcing the liability of a stockholder by suffering the stockholders to resume business, he taking a bond for protection of the machinery assigned to him. Id. One employed by a corporation on a monthly salary, part of the time as a drummer, and the rest of the time shipping and receiving goods, etc., is a clerk within the General Incorporation Act making stockholders individually liable for moneys due laborers, servants, clerks, etc., in case of insolvency. (Tenn.) 96.

Railroad corporations. A railroad company which has acquired a majority of the stock of another company in the absence of express statutory authority cannot vote such stock in the election of officers, or in matters pertaining to the management and control of the latter company, at least where they are rivals. (Ala.) 605. An averment of refusal by the officers of a corporation, upon request, to prevent the unlawful voting of corporate stock, will authorize a suit by stockholders in their own names for that purpose. Id. Averments upon information and belief are insufficient in the absence of allegation that the information is true. Id.

Associations other than for politics or business. Statutes which provide for the incorporation of clubs without requiring them to pay a tax on capital stock are void in so far as they undertake to allow the creation of corporations for other than benevolent, religious, scientific or educational purposes. (Mo.) 734. An association for the encouragement of debating, reading and literature, and social amusements, and lawful games, with no pecuniary profits, and no connection with business or politics, and whose articles provide that no saloon shall be kept or liquors sold in connection with it, may be incorporated without the payment of a tax on capital stock. Id.

State institutions; public schools. The regulation of the public schools is a state matter exclusively within the dominion of the Legislature. (Ind.) 240. The fact that it has always intrusted the management of school affairs to local organizations will not preclude it from at any time changing the system. Id. As incident to its constitutional power, the Legislature may provide that the books shall be obtained through the medium of a contract awarded to the best or lowest bidder. Id. It may impose upon all officers whose tenure is legislative such duties as it deems proper, and these duties may be enforced by mandamus. Id. It may give one person the exclusive right for a certain time to furnish books to public schools, and may permit the selection of copyrighted works without the Act being within the constitutional provision against monopolies. Id. The stated reading of the Bible in a public school renders it a place of worship within the provision of the Constitution, and renders the school a re-religious seminary within the prohibition of the Constitution that no money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious seminaries. (Wis.) 830. The "sectarian instruction" prohibited by the Constitution is instruction in religious doctrines which are believed by some sects and rejected by others. Id. Courts will take judicial notice of the contents of the Bible, and that the religious world is divided into sects, and of the general doctrines maintained by each sect. Id. The use of the Bible as a text-book in the public schools without restriction is "sectarian instruction." Id. There is no room for construction of a constitution outside of the words themselves if they are unambiguous. Id.

II. CONTRACTUAL RELATIONS.

Contracts in general; construction; validity.

An ambiguous term with an established meaning should be treated as used according to that understanding. (N. Y.) 831. Doctrine applied to the contract for services of a ball player giving the right to "reserve" such player for the ensuing season. Id. A parol lease for one year, to commence in future, is invalid. (Minn.) 671. A negotiable note growing out of a wager contract is invalid. (Tenn.) 703. But papers executed to shield the maker's son from a threatened prosecution for a felony are not executed under duress and may be enforced. (Ark.) 551. Where a written proposition is made by one party, which, after a parol modification of some of its terms, is accepted, such written proposition is the best evidence of so much of the resulting contract as it contains. (Ohio St.) 701. The Statute of Frauds has no application to a contract performed by one of the parties thereto. (Ind.) 784. A contract within the Statute of Frauds is not void but voidable. Id.

Marine policy. Where the insurer of a vessel assumes all risk of damage by fires except those caused by boiler explosions, a subsequent clause will not relieve from liability for loss by other causes of fire. (Ind.) 899. The violation of warranties need not be negated by insured in an action upon the policy. Id. The six months' limit of action on the policy begins to run from the close of the sixty days allowed the company for payment. (W. Va.) 572. A charterer in possession has an insurable interest, and may insure and recover indemnity for the owner as well as himself. Id.

Fire insurance policy. Failure to furnish proof of loss within the time required by the policy of fire insurance is waived when the insured is lulled into security by the acts of the company or its agents. (Ky.) 81. A co-owner of a part of unpartitioned land being a life tenant of the rest of the land, stating that he is an unconditional owner, does not make a material misrepresentation which will avoid the policy where neither fraudulent nor material to the risk. Id. The mere expression of opinion as to value cannot, in the absence of bad faith, defeat the right to recover on a fire policy. Id. An entry by a landlord to rebuild under an agreement with the tenant relieves the company from its contract to indemnify the tenant against payment of rent during the time the premises were untenable. (Pa.) 411.

Life insurance policies. The amount for which a policy may be taken out by a person on his own life is not limited. (Tex.) 217. One has an insurable interest in the life of his brother. Id. The designation of a beneficiary who has no insurable interest in the life of the insured does not render the policy void; he may be treated as assignee, appointee or trustee of the proceeds. Id. The signature of an applicant written at the beginning of the paper is for purposes of identification merely. Id. His warranty that his answers to the medical examiner are true does not make him responsible if his answers are incorrectly written down. Id. Yet it is his duty to see that proper corrections are made or he will be estopped to dispute them as written. Id. If payment is contested because of false answers, the jury must be confined to such answers as were put in issue. Id. Where an applicant states that no prior application by him was ever rejected, he may show that the agent informed him that certain societies were not regarded as life insurance companies and need not be so considered by him. Id. Failure of insured to pay a premium becoming due before his death, where no notice that it is due has been sent him, does not destroy the validity of the policy. (N. Y.) 293. The company must show that notice was given, and payment or tender before action on the policy is not necessary. Id.

Benefit certificates. The insanity of a member of a benefit society brings him within the provisions of its rule which entitles him to weekly benefits for incapacity to earn his living. (Pa.) 210. The purchaser of a certificate subsequently substituted as beneficiary may, on death of insured, collect the money due and retain the amount of his advancements, assessments, etc., with interest, but will hold the residue as trustee for the heirs of insured. (Tex.) 189.

For services. An agreement between master and servant that if either terminates the employment without notice he shall forfeit two weeks' wages is reasonable. (Conn.) 286. Such forfeiture is a defense although no special damage is shown. Id.

Contracts of sale; real property. The signature of the vendor to the contract is not necessary. (Conn.) 87. A contract to purchase of a man "his place" in a certain town, "containing fifteen acres more or less," sufficiently describes the property. Id. The objection that it is void for uncertainty cannot be raised on appeal. Id.

Personal property. The purchaser of wheat for seed is subject to the rule of caveat emptor. (Mont.) 471. There is no warranty of quality where the seller said he did not know what kind it was. Id. A contract may be rescinded on insolvency of the buyer before delivery. (Iowa) 189.

Conveyances. The possession of a deed by the grantee is prima facie evidence of delivery. (N. Y.) 555. The grantee of the heirs of one deed to be acknowledged. Id. The grantee in a quit-claim deed takes with notice of prior equities, and is not protected against an unrecorded bond for a deed for value. (Iowa) 524. The undeclared lunacy of a grantor does not impair the title of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice from his grantee. (N. C.) 118. A conveyance while the common-law right to dower was suspended bars all claim of the wife although she did not join in the conveyance. (N. C.) 118. A will is not invalid because made on Sunday. The drafting and execution do not constitute "common labor" within the Statute. (Ind.) 498.

Sealed instruments. Any valid contract be-material particular, will vitiate the note as to the surety if made without his consent. (S. C.) 742. An addendum increasing the rate of interest is a material alteration and imports no consideration. Id. Indulgence to the debtor by extending time for payment is a valuable consideration, as against a surety on a note given for the same debt. (S. C.) 743. A partner signing a bond as surety, in expectation that his partner would also sign, is not relieved from liability because the latter refuses to do so. (Pa.) 749. The approval on a legal holiday of the bond of an assignee for creditors by a court commissioner is not prohibited by the Legal Holiday Act. (Wis.) 421.

III. COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Regulation of commerce. In view of the power of Congress to regulate commerce, an Act extending the benefits of the Limited Liability Act to vessels engaged in inland navigation is valid. (Ga.) 55. If by an Act of Congress internal commerce is only incidentally affected, and the subjects are separable and partly under national control, an Act of Congress will be sustained wherever the power of Congress extends; and it is immaterial that somewhere it has a casual or contingent effect upon the domain of state legislation. Id. The entire purpose of the limited liability enactments was to encourage investments in shipping, and they may be extended wherever the admiralty courts of the United States have jurisdiction. Id. The section of the Statute prohibiting the exportation of Sab from Idaho is unconstitutional. (Idaho) 288. Intoxicating liquors transported from another State to a point in Kansas are subject to the laws of Kansas relating to the sale and disposition of such property, as are other intoxicating liquors already rightfully existing in the State, and cannot be sold at the place of destination, in the original packages or other form, except as the laws of the State prescribe. The police power of the State, so exercised, does not infringe on the power delegated to Congress to regulate commerce between the States. (Kan.) 183. Intoxicating liquors transported from one State cannot be sold within another State for uses forbidden by its laws, although the transportation itself cannot be prevented by such State. (Iowa) 205. When a carrier ceases to be a carrier and becomes a warehouseman, he cannot be protected as a carrier by the constitutional provisions as to regulations of commerce. Id. A railroad company which aids in violation of the law, in the sale of liquors, cannot defeat the right to condemn them by claiming a lien on the liquors for freight. Id.

Commercial paper. To be a promissory note, the instrument must contain on its face an express promise to pay money; hence an I. O. U. is not a promissory note. (Mass.) 302. A note for a valuable consideration, payable at maker's convenience, may be enforced after a reasonable time on demand and refusal to pay. (Ill.) 204. But suit cannot be maintained on a note surrendered up for a new note. (Ind.)

590. An Indian, as such, is not capable of giving a valid note. (Ind.) 782. A provision in a note for attorney's fees is not contrary to public policy and therefore void. (N. M.) 443; but a provision for a percentage of the amount due as attorney's fees destroys its negotiability. (Cal.) 224. Where the amount of his fees is fixed by the contract it will be presumed to be reasonable. (N. M.) 445. A recital in a note that it is given for a privilege which may subsequently be withdrawn will not destroy its negotiability; and indorsees are not put upon inquiry as to subsequent failure of consideration. (Ill.) 537. A promissory note will pass by delivery without indorsement as a gift inter vivos. (R. I.) 197.

Carriers of merchandise. A domestic corporation, engaged as a common carrier, has no right to discriminate in its freight rates; and where it fixes a rate per hundred pounds for carrying petroleum oil in oil tank cars, it is exercising its franchise in contravention of law. (Ohio) 319. Where a railway company exercises its franchise in contravention of law the state court has jurisdiction though the corporation may be engaged in interstate commerce. Id. A state statute providing a penalty for refusal to deliver freight on payment or tender of charges is not invalid as a regulation of commerce. (Tex.) 478. The penalty applies to the company only which executes, authorizes or ratifies the execution of the bill of lading, and another company bound by statute to transport cannot be considered as ratifying the original contract. Id. The original way-bill is evidence as to the payment of charges, and exhibition of the bill of lading is not a condition precedent of right to recover the penalty. Id. A common carrier waives his right to detain goods for freight if he refuses to deliver upon the ground that they are not in his possession at the place where demand is made. (Ind.) 211.

Banks and banking. The title to commercial paper sent by one bank to another for collection does not pass to the latter prior to collection, although sent "for collection and credit." (N. Y.) 532. Nor is it laches to fail for sixteen days to give notice of its claim and make demand on the assignee of the latter bank for the proceeds of the paper. Id. Such assignee takes no title, but it is his duty to remit such proceeds. Id. The transmitting bank occupies a position no different from that of other creditors of the assigning bank. Id. The bank receiving a draft for collection is liable for the failure and default of its correspondent. (Minn.) 863. A telegram stating: "Tate is good. Send on your paper,"—is a written acceptance of a check. (Mo.) 428. A letter to a bank, that the writer will honor consignor's drafts with bill of lading attached, is governed by the usage of trade known to both parties. (Pa.) 209. A bank which has charged up to the drawer, canceled and sent a draft in payment of a check, cannot stop its payment to the correspondent bank, because of the insolvency of the bank first receiving the check for collection. (N. Y.) 559. Only the first of several banks successively receiving a check for collection is the agent of the payee. Id. A letter to a bank by the holder of drafts indorsed in blank, referring to his bank account and to the drafts as "collections," "discounts" and "acceptances," is not notice that he is not the absolute owner. (Colo.) 845. A bona fide purchaser of such drafts has a good title without regard to prior equities between the owner and the collecting agent. Id. Presentation of a check, and notice of nonpayment to the drawer, are not necessary when the drawer has no funds on deposit. (Ind.) 489. One who accepts a certified check in the usual course of business does not assume the risk of the solvency of the bank upon which it is drawn, but may look to the drawer for payment. (Ind.) 443. Its acceptance does not ipso facto constitute payment, or novation of the debt. Id. Acceptance is necessary to give the holder a right of action against the bank; it is inferred from the retention of the check by the bank, and a subsequent charge of its amount to the drawer. (Tenn.) 93. The possession of an undorsed check, by a bank, does not raise the presumption of payment to the nominal payee. Id. A bank is put upon inquiry as to the right of an executrix to transfer stock to herself as an individual; and if the bank relies upon the statement of another as to her ownership, instead of consulting the will, it can claim no lien as security against those who are entitled to the stock under the will. (R. I.) 823. The purchaser of a check for value without notice, made payable to the drawer's own order, the certification procured by fraud, who by mistake takes it without indorsement of payee, holds it subject to all defenses which the bank would have against it in the hands of the payee. (N. Y.) 595.

Partnership. A patent right is property within the meaning of the Act which permits the contribution of property to the capital of a limited copartnership. (Pa.) 663. And a description which gives the number of the patent, name of the inventor and date of its issue is sufficient. Id. Different letters-patent may be considered and valued together. Id. The fact that valuation was grossly excessive will not remove the limitation upon the partner's liability, if made under a mere mistake. Id. Declarations of one partner as to the business may be proved against the other partner. (Ind.) 90. Where a partnership property is kept for the purpose of carrying on a particular business, and not for sale, neither partner has power to make a sale of the entire property. (Ind.) 784.

IV. FIDUCIARY RELATIONS

Trust and trustees. Where a deed is made to a trustee without specifying the terms of the trust, the possibility that some other deed may exist for the benefit of other beneficiaries is not such defect in the chain of title as will warrant a refusal to accept the trust. (Mass.) 840. Where one article of a will provided for a certain fund to aid deserving college students, the fund referred to in a later article is to be used for the purposes specified. (Vt.) 517. Where a fund is given to a person absolutely, subject to a charge for the support of another during life, the court will not interfere at the suit of a third person to change the relation of the parties or the character of the fund. (Mass.) 893. One electing to take a devise under a will, requiring him to convey certain land of which he holds the title, cannot refuse to make such conveyance and claim the land. (Ky.) 454. Where trustees are authorized to carry on a business and contract debts therein, on termination of the trust a creditor of such trustees may bring suit in equity to reach the trust fund for the satisfaction of his debt without first recovering a judgment at law, and without an offer to make good to the trust estate losses incurred by defaults, for which the estate would have a claim on the trustee. (Mass.) 771. If two trustees retire, the other may carry on the business. Id. The right to a mortgage given to secure debts of creditors contracted while the three trustees acted will be lost if steps are not taken to secure it until proceedings are begun to wind up the trust, and bills have been filed by other creditors. Id.

Gift causa mortis. A valid gift causa mortis is made where one confined to his bed by a sickness and who is fully apprised of the probable fatal termination of the malady, instructs a person to whom he has intrusted the keys to a private box in a bank vault, to count therefrom a certain amount and place it into a separate package labeled as the property of a certain third person, and to deliver it to him in the event of the donor's death. (Ind.) 439. The person who receives the instructions in such case is a trustee for the donee, and not the agent of the donor. Id.

Gifts for public beneficial uses. The gift of a fund to a town to establish a public library to be held and managed by trustees for such use, and its acceptance by the town, constitute a contract protected by the constitutional prohibition against the impairment of contracts. (Mass.) 765. Persons making gifts to a fund already established are presumed to intend that it shall be held on the same trusts. Id. The taking of money by a private corporation administering a public charity is not a taking under the power of eminent domain. Id. It is a misappropriation of corporate funds for trustees of a benevolent association to donate ordinarily before being by a member to compel restoration. Id.

Trust estates. A trust estate is not chargeable with compensation of a broker for securing a loan for the benefit of the trust, and the death of the trustee will not render it so liable. (Ill.) 256. The trustee of an insolvent takes the estate subject to all outstanding equities; so, a solvent surety may set off his claim for payment, against debts due to his insolvent principal. (Conn.) 84. The assignee of an insolvent, receiving the deed of assignment and key to his storehouse, is in possession of the debtor's property; but such delivery of possession before filing the inventory and executing the bond avoids the assignment. (Ark.) 408. A party to an illegal trust combination cannot claim the proceeds of goods furnished against a receiver of the trust assets. The rule against relieving a party to an illegal contract does not apply to such receiver. (N. Y.) 46.

Surviving partner. A surviving partner has the right to sell and convey partnership real estate to pay the debts of the firm. (Ind.) 481. Such sale will not be invalidated by a prior conveyance by the trustee of the deceased partner. Id. The widow of a deceased partner, who has received proceeds in excess of the amount necessary to pay firm debts, is estopped from claiming any interest in the real estate as against purchasers. (Ind.) 481.

that account and charges himself with an amount retained by him to pay annuities, the annuitants cannot impress the funds in the hands of the assignee with a trust for payment of their annuities. (Mass.) 570. The trust will attach to the money held by the trustee only so long as it can be identified. Id. A sale of land by executors under a will is not affected by a statute regulating the conduct of judicial sales of land directed by will to be sold. (Ind.) 788. An executor may convey his testator's interest in partnership real estate, and the surviving partner may purchase the same. Such sale is authorized by a will giving power to settle, adjust and compromise all debts owing by the testator; and equity will not disturb the settlement and final accounting so consummated between them. After fourteen years the settlement and accounting will not be opened up although it was irregularly made. Id.

Warehousesmen as bailees. A deposit of grain is a bailment, the title remaining in the depositor. (Minn.) 529. Holders of receipts for such deposits are tenants in common in the mass, and the warehouseman himself may be one of them, and if he sells any grain in excess of his receipts his sale passes no title and depositors may follow it into the hands of his purchasers. Id.

V. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

Marriage and divorce. Those belonging to an Indian tribe within the State, recognized by custom and the law of the tribe as married, must be so treated and their offspring be regarded as legitimate. (Minn.) 125. A marriage between a man and his housekeeper may be established without proof of a marriage ceremony. His introduction of her as his wife, and she being so regarded by the community, are sufficient. (Cal.) 709. Marriage may be proved by the conduct of the parties where the habit and repute is all uniform and undivided, although the connection of the parties was in its beginning meretricious. Id. The presumption that a connection is illicit is rebuttable, and evidence of cohabitation and repute is proof of marriage in a suit for divorce. Id. In Georgia marriages between whites and persons of African descent are void. (Ga.) 50. Where the Statute is silent as to the legal effect of marriage entered into in a foreign State to evade the laws of this State, it will be held void; but when the statutory prohibition relates to form, or ceremony, or qualifications depending on age, etc., it may be upheld. Id. Marriage is not a "contract," within the constitutional inhibition as to the impairment of obligations of contract; it is more than a contract, and the rights and qualifications of the parties thereto depend on state legislation and control. Id. The words of the Statute "physically and incurably incapacitated from entering into the marriage state," mean impotency to consummate the marriage. (Ala.) 426. To discover this a personal examination by physicians or matrons skilled in such matters may be ordered. 7 L. R. A.

in cases of malformation or abnormal development, or where defendant contests the woman's right to relief. Id. A decree a mensa et thoro, entered under the Statute, does not bar an action for divorce a vinculo matrimonii, upon any of the grounds specified by statute. (Minn.) 448. Cruelty, as a statutory ground of divorce, may be set up by a plea of recrimination as a bar to a bill for divorce on the ground of adultery. (R. I.) 385.

Husband and wife. A husband has no rights as tenant by the curtesy in his wife's estate in remainder where she died before expiration of the life tenancy. (Conn.) 698. The damages which a husband may recover for loss of his wife's services may include their value as manager of his business. (Ind.) 852. Her right to carry on business does not prevent her rendering him services in his business. Id. Nor does the marital relation prevent him from acting as her agent. (Fla.) 640. At common law a married woman cannot contract so as to bind herself personally, and no exception to this rule is created by a marriage contract. Id. She cannot bind herself by a judgment note, unless given for the benefit of her separate estate, or for her separate business, or for necessities. (Pa.) 211. Where coverture avoids a contract it likewise bars a personal recovery against the wife on the ground of the fraud connected therewith. (Fla.) 640. A married woman is personally liable for her civil torts, including frauds other than those applicable to her contracts. Id. Her inchoate right of dower in the foreclosure of a mortgage given by her husband's grantor is derived from such grantor, and not from her husband, and is not cut off by the foreclosure judgment. (N. Y.) 229. The divorced wife of a member of a mutual benefit society is not entitled to share in the fund payable by the society to his heirs at his death. (Tex.) 189. The possession by a wife of land under a parol gift from her husband is not adverse to his mortgagee while the husband resides with her upon the land. (Ala.) 568.

Parent and child. It is the legal, as well as the moral, duty of parents to support their children during minority, and their express or implied promise to pay for necessities may be inferred from the grounds of the legal duty imposed. (Iowa) 176. A partial emancipation of a daughter will not exempt the father from liability for necessary services of a physician employed by her. Id.

"Family" defined. The relation of husband and wife or of parent and child is not necessary to constitute a family. (S. O.) 747. A brother who lives with his sister in a house belonging to her, she being dependent upon him for a living, is the head of a family, within the Homestead Laws. Id. A homestead exemption is allowable in partnership property. Id.

VI. PROPERTY RIGHTS AND REMEDIES.

In general. The use of stairways in a building erected by several owners as a single structure cannot be denied to a part owner. (Pa.) 752. A permission or license to use property in a particular manner, or for a particular purpose, on the faith of expenditure of money, is executed and irrevocable. Id. Purchasers are chargeable with notice of the servitude. Id. The right to assign a contract does not permit one who has ordered machines, agreeing to give his own notes therefor and turn over as collateral any notes taken by him from purchasers, to assign the contract so as to substitute another in his stead whose note must be accepted in lieu of his own. (Iowa) 189. The right to kill a dog, given by statute to a person whom the dog had suddenly assaulted, need not be exercised instantly. The person may go for a weapon and return, follow it into the shop of a third person and kill the dog. (R. I.) 888. A person bitten while interfering in a dog fight is not "suddenly assaulted." Id. Sunday is to be deemed a dies non in determining a creditor's right to redeem premises sold on execution from a prior redeeming creditor. In such a case redemption may be made on the following Monday, if the prior redemption was made on Saturday. (N. Y.) 847. Where pension money can be directly traced to property convenient for the support of the pensioner and his family, such property is exempt from execution; but if mingled with other funds in trade the pensioner loses the benefit of the exemption. (N. Y.) 557.

Notice of right and title to property. What ever puts upon inquiry is in equity notice of what inquiry would disclose. (R. I.) 826. A mortgagee of real property will not be charged with constructive notice of an action for the recovery of such property pending in another county. (Ohio St.) 812. The doctrine of lis pendens applies only where the court has jurisdiction of the subject matter. Id. Declarations as to the ownership of property, made by a person in possession thereof, are admissible in evidence upon an issue as to ownership. (Ind.) 784.

Estates in land. A life estate in one, with remainder to another, may be created by will and at the same time power be given to the life tenant to defeat the remainder by disposal of the property. (Ky.) 836. Giving a life estate to the widow with authority to dispose of the property as she pleases, but with remainder over, does not give her the absolute ownership. Id. But a remainder over in a will is void for repugnancy, where the estate has been given generally or indefinitely, with an absolute power of disposition. (Vt.) 517. Principle applied to a devise to testator's wife for her sole use during life, and to dispose of as she pleases. Id. The exercise of the power of appointment by will by one having a life interest in trust property to confirm title to a person who had previously purchased for a valuable consideration does not make the property assets of the appointor's estate liable in equity for her debts. (Ga.) 148. When a person is, by the terms of an instrument, entitled absolutely to property, any provision therein postponing its transfer or payment to him is void. (Mich.) 877. A general devise to a testator's widow, subject to the payment of debts, funeral charges and expenses of administration, in full confidence that she will make every needful provision for his children, will not include a trust estate. (R. I.) 886. Under a will providing that a daughter shall receive a certain sum for her support, with no devise over except to her father if then living, she is entitled on her father's death to the immediate enjoyment of the entire estate, although she has not yet reached the age specified in the will. (Mich.) 877.

Estate granted by deed. An estate granted by deed cannot be expanded by recitals in a later deed to the injury of an intervening title. (Mass.) 618. The conveyance of a right of way gives the grantee such rights as are incident or necessary to the enjoyment of such right of passage. (N. Y.) 226. No reservation of a right of way or of any use will be presumed in a conveyance. Id.

Estates transferred by will. A testator must be presumed to have used words in their ordinary primary sense or meaning. (N. Y.) 867. The words "nephews and nieces hereinbefore named," in the residuary clause of a will, do not include grandnephews and grandnieces who have been twice previously referred to in the will as "children" of a "deceased niece." Id. Property disposed of by will under a power of appointment is not liable for appointor's debts unless his assets are insufficient to pay them. (Ga.) 148. The donor of the income of a trust fund to a person for life may qualify the gift by a provision that the right to receive the income shall be inalienable. (Mass.) 894. When so much of the inimmediate, and such income cannot be reached by a creditor of the donee. Id. Where for a number of years the income is sufficient to pay in full a specific annuity, a surplus in subsequent years should be paid to annuitant in satisfaction of the previous deficiencies, and not to the next of kin. (N. Y.) 361. A legacy of a certain number of shares of certain stock is specific where another clause of the will disposes of certain other shares of the same stock. (Mass.) 290. Such a legacy is admeasured by its subsequent sale, whether the will is republished by a codicil or not. Id. A bequest of the use and improvement of testator's estate to certain persons "during their natural lives" gives them a life estate only. (Conn.) 410. Permission to devisees for life to use so much as is necessary for their comfort will give them the right to use what is necessary for their support. Id. Children born to them will take under the will the remainder after the life estate to the exclusion of the heirs at law of the testator. Id. The adoption of a child does not operate to revoke an antecedent will of the adopting father. (Ind.) 485.

Leasehold estate. Where tenants enter under a lease for a term of more than one year, void for want of authority of the owner's agent to make it and pay the rent, they may become tenants from year to year and the termination of the respective terms will correspond each year with the date of entry, and if they hold over they cannot terminate the tenancy until such date, except that they may quit at the day fixed in the lease, should such day be reached. (N. Y.) 60.

Riparian rights. Riparian rights are not lost by non-user. (Mass.) 613. A grant of a right to draw a quantity of water confers no right to have the water held back to supply the given amount. Id. The grant to a lower proprietor to have water flow down sufficient to run two paper engines does not include a quantity sufficient to run the entire mill machinery. Id. A provision in the deed requiring grantees to contribute to the expense of the dam flume and gate of the reservoir does not give the right to have the water held back for his benefit. Id. The right of mill owners to divert the water of a stream does not include the right to lower the surface of the water of a great natural pond or lake. (Me.) 459. This may be prevented by injunction. Id. The right of a riparian proprietor upon navigable waters to improve, reclaim and occupy the submerged lands out to the point of navigability may be separated therefrom, and be transferred to persons having no interest in the original riparian estate. (Mass.) 772.

Liens and incumbrances on real property. A purchaser of land assuming payment of his vendor's purchase-money notes secured by vendor's lien becomes personally responsible to the original lien holder for their payment as well as for the balance of the purchase price owing by him to his immediate vendor. (Tenn.) 33. They are his personal debts, and in case of his death both sums are charged upon his personal estate. Id. An affidavit to an account for a mechanic's lien sworn to before the notary of another State, authenticated by the terms of the original contract. (Pa.) 711. A lien for the price of lubricating oil is not given by a statute giving a lien for materials furnished for protection of the machinery. (Wis.) 191. Work done in engraving copper shells for printing on cloth creates no lien on "cloth-printing machines" sold as complete without such shells. (N. J.) 48.

Mortgage lien. One who takes a mortgage on real estate from an heir pending settlement of the estate acquires no greater interest than that of the heir himself. (Ind.) 225. A mortgagee in possession may lawfully take down or carry away buildings erected by him, the materials being his own and not so connected with the soil that they cannot be removed without injury to it. (Or.) 273. The party having the right to remove a chattel may do so while in possession of the land. Id. Where a mortgagor in possession removed a building to another lot the remedy of the mortgagee was at law, for the removal of the building. (N. J. Eq.) 690. Mortgagee may have his lien protected by injunction. Id. A provision in a mortgage that the whole sum secured shall become due on any default in payment will not make notes due before their maturity. Priority is to be determined by the order in which they fall due according to their terms. (Iowa) 365. A valid chattel mortgage may be made by the owner of property in possession of another under an execution. (Ill.) 730. A mortgagee is precluded from recovering possession of the mortgaged premises after foreclosure by action; but if he can obtain possession in any lawful or peaceable mode, he may retain possession of such premises, as against the mortgagor or any person claiming under him subsequent to the mortgage, until his mortgage debt is paid. (Or.) 273. Where at a void foreclosure sale the mortgagee becomes the purchaser of the mortgaged premises and attempts to convey such premises, his deed operates as an assignment of the mortgage debt, as well as the mortgage securing the same. Id. If for any cause the proceedings in foreclosure are ineffectual and the mortgagee purchases at a sale thereunder, his relation to the mortgaged premises is that of a mortgagee in possession. Id.

Partition of estates held in common. An equitable claim for unauthorized improvements of land held in common may be allowed on a sale for purpose of partition. (R. L.) 791. The value of a barn erected under an agreement in the lease by a life tenant and the owners of one half the remainder in fee, should be deducted from the proceeds of the partition sale before distribution. Id. A debt due to the estate from an heir may be deducted from his distributive share of the proceeds of real estate which has been sold in process of administration. (Ind.) 235.

Estoppel to claim rights. A false representation or concealment of material facts, or a design to mislead, is not necessary to constitute an equitable estoppel by an act calculated to mislead. (N. Y.) 755. Doctrine applied to a case where one was induced to purchase lands. The party who influenced him was estopped from setting up his own title against that of the purchaser. Id. Borrowing from a forger money which he had obtained from a forged mortgage on property of the borrower will not estop the latter from setting up the forgery. (Ark.) 551. No stipulation between third persons can continue an obligation from which the law relieves a party. (Pa.) 411. Principle applied to an insurance company's letter stating that it could not be discharged from liability on a policy insuring a tenant against liability for rent in case the leased buildings are burned, and that such defense would not be raised. Id. One who has taken the benefit of a building regulation cannot repudiate the conditions on which it is given. (D. C.) 649. One who has executed and delivered securities in consideration of such a promise after his illegal purpose has failed, and a prosecution has been commenced by third parties, cannot rescind the contract and recover back the securities. (Ark.) 551. A bank is not estopped to deny its liability on a check which it has certified, even as against a bona fide holder for value. (N. Y.) 595. A bank whose certification has been procured by fraud cannot maintain an action to recover possession of an undorsed check against a bona fide purchaser from payee. Id. An insurance company is not prevented from setting up the suicide of an insured person as a defense to its liability on the policy, notwithstanding the Statute provides only for fraud as a ground of defense. (Pa.) 576.

Arbitration and award. An attorney has no implied authority to submit a case to arbitration in pais, nor make any material change in the submission without order or direction of the court. (Conn.) 568. A dispute as to the ownership of a strip of land, claimed by each party in fee simple, cannot be settled by arbitration. (Mich.) 720. A change in a written submission, by which the award is to be made final instead of being returned to court for judgment, is a material change which an attorney cannot make unless expressly authorized. (Conn.) 568.

Limitation of action. The Statute of Limitations cannot run against any person until his or her right has accrued. (Pa.) 568. So the holding of land by the grantee during the life of the grantor is not adverse to the dower right of his wife. Id. In cases of fraud the Statute begins to run in equity from the time of discovery of the fraud. (R. I.) 826. When a debt is barred, the new promisor must acknowledge its justness and express willingness to pay. (Tex.) 72. A letter simply saying "I have done my best to raise some money," etc., does not remove the bar. Id.

Abatement of action. The death of one of two physicians sued as partners for unskillful treatment does not abate the action as to the survivor. (Ind.) 90. The mere pendency of a suit against the lessee of a wharf to recover damages for injuries caused by its defective condition will not abate a subsequent suit for the same purpose against the owner of the wharf. (Md.) 272.

Writ and process. One brought within the jurisdiction upon requisition as a fugitive from justice, and tried and discharged as to the offense charged, is not subject to arrest on a civil process until a reasonable time and opportunity have been given him to return to the State from which he was taken. (Wis.) 817. Where a man has a settled abode in another State for business or pleasure he is a nonresident within the Attachment Law. (Cal.) 127. The ratification of an attorney's act in bringing an unauthorized attachment suit will not give priority to the attachment lien. (Ark.) 405. A writ of ne exeat will not be issued to aid the collection of a judgment recovered at law against a woman. (Mass.) 896. A suit cannot be carried on by the initials merely of the Christian name of the plaintiff; and a motion to dismiss the writ on this ground is equivalent to a plea in abatement. (Mich.) 629. An injunction may be granted to prevent a cloud on title obtained by adverse possession. (Mo.) 67.

Actions and suits arising under will. A complaint in an action to contest a will, alleging that testator's intention was different from that expressed by the will, is demurrable. (Ind.) 498. Although heirs of a deceased partner cannot compel the surviving partner to account, yet circumstances may exist to make it proper to entertain action on their behalf. (Ind.) 788. In a proceeding taken to put heirs in possession of an estate an issue must be joined, proof must be taken and judgment rendered, recognizing their capacity to take possession. (La. Ann.) 265. Heirs entitled to a third of certain lands, who claim no more than that part which is set off by metes and bounds, may sue therefor without joining other heirs, where the latter have already received a conveyance of a part equivalent to their share. (Ky.) 454. The fact that distributees have received a portion of the estate will not preclude them from exercising their right as covenantees to enforce the covenant, where their liability will in no event be co-extensive with their claim. (Mass.) 804. The indebtedness of a legatee to the estate may be set off against his claim to the legacy. (Ind.) 231. Taxable costs of all parties in a suit for the construction of a will may be ordered to be paid out of the funds of the estate before distribution. (Vt.) 517.

Equitable relief in cases of contract. A suit by a vendor for a specific performance cannot be defeated on the ground that there is a remedy at law. (Conn.) 87. To defeat it the remedy must be as complete and beneficial at law as in equity. Id. Where a number of contracts constitute one transaction and are separable, those not within the Statute of Frauds may be enforced, and the others avoided. (Ind.) 782. An action on contract is within the jurisdiction of the courts of the place of performance, although the parties reside in other States. (Mich.) 511. A covenant under seal by a life tenant, having power to dispose of the remainder of the estate by will, to refrain from disposing of a portion of such remainder upon consideration that the will granting the power shall not be contested, is enforceable. (Mass.) 804. But a covenantee who accepts his share of the money paid for a release of his obligation cannot enforce the covenant. Id. Proceedings by administration of deceased covenantee, to procure other covenantees to release, will not estop him from setting up an independent right as covenantee. Id. The words "then surviving," applied to heirs-at-law, refer to the time of the death of the life tenant. Id.

Equity will not relieve from securities executed to shield a person from prosecution for a felony of which he is guilty. (Ark.) 551.

Personal services. Contracts for personal services will not be specifically enforced. (Conn.) 779. Their negative enforcement by injunction will not be made, where the services are purely intellectual, peculiar or individual in character. Id. Principle applied to an agreement by an employé not to allow his name to be used in any business similar to that of his employer. Id. Services devolved upon an employé by the general manager of the business are not "peculiar" or "individual." Id. Equity will not enjoin the breach of a negative promise unless the contract was such that a decree for its specific performance could be enforced by the court. (N. Y.) 381.

Equity; principles as to burden of loss. Where one of two innocent persons must suffer, the loss must fall upon him who put it in the power of a third person to cause the loss. (S. C.) 745. Principle applied to one who signs a negotiable note as surety, upon a condition known only to the principal. Id. A bank which pays forged checks to other banks, which had in good faith advanced money on them to the forger, must bear the loss. (Ky.) 849. On the embezzlement of the money received on a mortgage by a person employed by the mortgagor to produce the money, and who was also agent of the lender for the purpose of examining the title, etc., the mortgagor who left the business to the agent without inquiry for months must bear the loss. (Pa.) 750.

VII. DAMAGES FOR TORTS.

In general, liability for torts. Damages for injury to premises by a negligent construction of a sewer must be limited to the actual damage sustained up to the time of bringing suit. (Tenn.) 465. The grantor of a right of way cannot deposit thereon stone or other obstruction, or in any way obstruct or injure the road bed. (N. Y.) 226. A commercial agency is not exempted from liability for gross negligence in erroneously giving the financial standing of a person. (Pa.) 661. An iron railing surmounted with sharp points, placed around an area, will not subject the owner to liability for injury to a traveler who, to save himself from falling, was injured by one of the sharp points. (Pa.) 120. Where several buildings in succession take fire, each from another, the burning of the last building to catch fire was not the proximate result of the setting fire to the first, when the fire was actually communicated by the intermediate buildings. (N. Y.) 180. An action sounding in tort cannot be maintained to recover damages for injuries to lands by surface water from a drain constructed in accordance with a judgment of a court, although subsequently reversed. (Ind.) 495. Where the united and contemporaneous negligence of two persons causes a collision between them, neither can recover for a resulting injury. (Ind.) 678. To stand in the carriage-way of a public street at night is such negligence as will prevent recovery for injuries resulting from being thrown down by a wagon. Id. One who causes work to be done is not ordinarily liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of employes of an independent contractor, unless the injury might have been anticipated as a direct or probable consequence of the work contracted for. (Ohio) 701. An agent of a nonresident is personally liable for injuries resulting from the dangerous condition of the premises. (Ill.) 128.

Party cannot shift his responsibility on another. A party under an antecedent obligation to do a thing cannot get rid of his responsibility by deputing it to somebody else. (D. C.) 649. The obligation to make good all damages to an adjoining owner by interference with a party-wall cannot be escaped by employing a contractor to do the work. Id. A building regulation established under Act of Congress may properly require owners to make good all damages to the adjoining owner. Id. One who takes the benefit of such regulation cannot repudiate its conditions. Id.

Libel and slander. A publication containing imputations that a member of the Legislature went there solely for the purpose of passing a bill to enrich himself and his copartners in a certain scheme is libelous. (Mich.) 300. A caricature printed in connection with charges of corruption in the passage of a legislative bill constitutes a libel if the charges are not true; and the inducement is sufficient where it shows that plaintiff was a member of the Legislature and the introducer of the bill and was the person referred to in the publication. No innuendo is needed where the meaning of the publication is plain. Id.

Negligent exercise of profession. For failure of a physician to give proper instructions in the care of a broken leg set by him he is liable for resulting injury. (Iowa) 566. A lawyer cannot be held liable for a mistake in reference to a matter in which members of the profession possessed of reasonable skill and knowledge may differ as to the law. (Ind.) 649. Doctrine applied to advice as to a mortgage of husband and wife given to secure the husband's debts. Id.

Telegraph companies. Mental anguish is a ground for the recovery of substantial damages against a telegraph company for failure to deliver a telegram, where the message is sufficient to inform the company that mental anguish will probably result. (Ind.) 588. The complaint to recover the statute penalty must state that the person addressed resided within the prescribed distance from the office. Id. The question of sufficiency of a telegram to inform the operator of its meaning is determined by facts and circumstances. (Ill.) 474. If sufficient appears to show that it relates to a commercial transaction, it is sufficient to charge negligence. Id.

Injuries to real property. To entitle an owner of land on a navigable river to maintain an action for obstruction to navigation, the obstruction must be the invasion of a private right. (Minn.) 673. Such action must state facts constituting special damage and that the injury was connected with a negligent act, or was the proximate result of such act. Id. A riparian owner has no right of action for the washing away of banks and bottom of a stream by the increased flow of water at times, occasioned by a dam made with legislative authority. (Me.) 460. Incidental injuries to land by a reasonable increase in the flow of water to facilitate driving logs is not a taking of property. Id.

Trespass on the case. Actions of trespass on the case are included in the Statute in the word "trespass," allowing an action therefor. (Tex.) 618. Hence the owners of a leased building who contribute to the injury of a tenant by consenting to the erection of an awning are liable for the consequent injuries to the tenants. Id. Doctrine applied to the miscarriage of a woman occupying the premises, caused by the falling of the awning and part of the wall attached thereto. Id.

Pollution and contamination of water. Although one may appropriate all the underground water in his soil he has no right to poison or contaminate it, so that when it reaches his neighbor's land it will be unfit for use by man or beast. (Ky.) 451. Doctrine applied to the owner of oil stored near a spring. Id. If liable to escape either above or underground, he must answer for the consequences; but on the question of damages evidence that he had previously sold water from the spring is inadmissible. Id. Where one erects a large feeding stable for cattle he will be enjoined from polluting a stream passing through neighboring land used for farming purposes. (Neb.) 457.

Nuisances. Damage caused by explosion of a powder magazine located on a lot smaller than that required by an ordinance is caused by the violation of the ordinance, and the destruction of buildings constituted it a nuisance per se. (Ill.) 202. The risk of injury by explosions is not assumed by adjoining owners, although other magazines existed when the lot was purchased. Id. Nuisances should be removed beyond the immediate neighborhood of residences. Id. Where the facts alleged constitute a nuisance, the term "nuisance" need not be used in the pleading. Id. A release to a railroad company of a right of way across certain land, with a further release from all claims for damages by reason of the taking and use of the land, will bar the owner from subsequently recovering damages for overflowing his land by the construction of a ditch and culvert. (Pa.) 218.

Carrier's liability for neglect of duty. The duty of common carriers is a duty independent of contract, arising by implication of law. (N. J.) 483. Independent of statutory requirement a railroad company is chargeable with the duty to fence its track if required to keep the track free from obstructions. (N. Y.) 527. A railroad company is not required to use extraordinary care or vigilance in respect to the safety of its highway crossings. (Ind.) 588. A railroad company cannot, by lease or contract or arrangement, turn over to another company its road and franchises, and thereby exempt itself from responsibility for the conduct and management of the road, but will be liable for injuries sustained on that portion of its road operated by the foreign company. (W. Va.) 854. It is, however, not liable for injuries inflicted by the lessee company upon its own agent or servant in operating the road. Id. It cannot be held responsible for injuries done by its servants unless the act was expressly or impliedly authorized or ratified by it. Id. A stockholder is not liable for the negligence of the officers, agents or employes of the company in the operation of its road. (Kan.) 414.

Liability of railroads for injuries to travelers and trespassers. An individual, in the exercise of his absolute rights, if it may endanger the safety of others, must exercise them with a due regard for the safety of others. (Ky.) 816. Running grip cars at a rate of speed prohibited by ordinance is negligence per se. (Mo.) 819. It is the duty of a railroad company, where a train crosses a public highway on a trestle, to give timely warning of the approach of the train to the crossing. (Ky.) 816. A traveler familiar with the place, who hurries to such crossing and attempts to cross, is guilty of negligence which will prevent recovery for injuries sustained through fright of his horse caused by the train. Id. Whether or not the failure to give warning is negligence, should be left to the jury. Id. The presumption of negligence of a railroad company as to a passenger does not obtain in case of injuries to the horse of a traveler attempting to cross the railroad track. (Ind.) 588. An unlicensed hack driver specially ordered for a passenger is not a trespasser in going with his carriage, for the purpose of meeting such passenger, upon a wharf used by the steamboat company, although the rules forbid any but private carriages, or carriages which are licensed, to stand upon the wharf. (R. I.) 802.

For death caused by negligence. Under an Act embodying the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act, suits for railway accidents must be brought by the personal representatives for the benefit of the widow and next of kin. (Ark.) 283. It does not take away the right which survives, to recover for injuries accrued by the common law, nor does it deprive the father of his right to sue for loss of service of his minor child; hence the three actions may be prosecuted at the same time and recoveries had in each. Id. In the action for the loss of services of a minor child the recovery is limited to damages accrued between the times of the injury and the death. Id. An administrator has no right, under the Employers' Liability Act, to recover damages on account of the death of his intestate, in addition to his right as legal representative to recover the damages which accrued to the intestate in his lifetime. (Mass.) 154. In actions for damages for death caused by negligence what was usually and habitually done may be proved to rebut a claim that an employe was negligent. (Mich.) 500. Mortuary tables are admissible in evidence to show expectancy of life. Id. Evidence as to the property of the family, and of an incumbency, is inadmissible in an action for the death of plaintiff's husband. Id. If no improper testimony has been admitted, the amount of damages awarded is beyond the reach of a writ of error. Id.

Injury to railroad employes. Injury to a brakeman from collision of the train with an animal makes the company liable for the damages under the General Railroad Act, which imposes the absolute duty to fence. (N. Y.)

a section hand, he being a superior agent charged with an act which the law imposes as a duty of the master; yet his command will not justify acts of an employé who sees a danger of which his superior is ignorant. (Mich.) 423. So whether the proximate cause of the injury was the act of the engineer or fireman or that of the assistant roadmaster is an important question in determining the liability of the master, and is for the jury to decide. Id. It is the duty of the master to supervise, direct and control the operation and management of his business; and a person invested with full control, subject to no supervision except his, stands in the place of the master and is not a fellow servant. (Mich.) 500. A train dispatcher is not a fellow servant with trainmen. Id. The contributory negligence of a fellow servant will not prevent the recovery for injury due in part to the negligence of the master. Id. A master who carries on an imminently dangerous undertaking is bound to know the character and extent of the danger, and to notify the servant specially and unequivocally. Constructive or obligatory knowledge on his part supplies actual knowledge, and such knowledge is presumed juris et de jure to exist, while the servant is held to the knowledge of patent defects only (La.) 172. The servant has a right to assume superior knowledge in his employer, to rely on his prudence and judgment and to believe that he will not unnecessarily jeopardize his person and life by avoidable risk. Id. An employé does not, by entering the service, assume a risk of danger incident thereto, which by reason of his youth and inexperience he does not know or appreciate, and to which the employer exposes him without warning him of it. (Ark.) 293. Whether or not he ought to have had knowledge or appreciation of the danger, is a question for the jury. Id.

As carrier of passengers. Railway companies are bound to keep the platforms at their passenger stations in a safe condition for persons to enter and leave the cars. (Ind.) 687. A passenger is justified in taking the way of passage held out by the company for entrance and exit to the public street, although another passageway might be taken. (N. J.) 435. Passengers have a right to assume that the means of access provided are reasonably safe. Id. Knowledge of the unsafe condition of the platform will not prevent a person using it from recovering for injuries caused by its defects. (Ky.) 44; (Ind.) 687. Where connecting companies use a station jointly, one company is not responsible for the neglect of the other over which the passenger is carried. (Kan.) 414. Where a railroad company legally holds stock negligence of such connecting road. Id. If a company neglects its duty to stop at a station, a passenger is not therefore justified in jumping from the moving train, unless expressly invited so to do. His unwillingness to be carried beyond his destination is no excuse. (La.) 111. The fact that the door of the car is open is no invitation to a passenger to pass through it for the purpose of jumping off while the train is running at full speed. (Mo.) 819. Calling the name of a station and stopping the train to take a side track while another train passes will not make the carrier liable for injuries to a passenger. (Ala.) 323. A passenger who alights from a grip car running at full speed is guilty of contributory negligence. (Mo.) 819. But it is not negligence for a passenger familiar with the management of railroads to go forward to the baggage car, and as the trains are about to collide to jump to the ground. (Mass.) 842. Whether or not alighting from a moving train constitutes negligence is a question of fact to be determined by the jury. (Ind.) 687. The fact that the passenger was traveling on Sunday, in violation of the Act concerning vice and immorality, does not preclude her from maintaining the action. (N. J.) 425.

As carrier of merchandise. A carrier of goods must protect the property from destruction or injury, and has the burden of proving that the goods were not in good condition when shipped or when received from a connecting carrier. (Iowa) 280. Nor can custom be invoked to protect it from negligence in failing to transport goods with care; and the rate of charge will not limit the care required, or restrict its liability. Id. Doctrine applied to a shipment of butter, destroyed by heat during transportation, by negligence to provide cold storage, and neglect to use ice in the cars used. Id.

Carrier; limitation of liability by contract. A limitation of liability in the bill of lading will not control where the damage is the effect of the carrier's negligence. (Ind.) 314. Unless specially provided for, an intermediate carrier can derive no benefit from a contract between the first carrier and the shipper. Id. A "fire clause" in a bill of lading exempting from liability for loss where transportation is not offered as an alternative, and no reduction of rates is made as a consideration for the exemption, is invalid. (Tenn.) 169. Mere acquiescence in the use of such bills will not show the reasonableness of the exemption. Id. A condition is reasonable only if coupled with compensating advantages to the shipper. Id. The contract must be fairly obtained, and must be both just and reasonable. Id.

VIII. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE

Lottery prohibited. "Lottery," within the Statute, embraces only schemes in which a valuable consideration is paid for a chance to draw a prize. (Ala.) 599. Distribution of prizes to holders of tickets where no payment is exacted is not illegal. Id.

Disturbing religious society. An information against certain parties charging willful, malicious and unlawful interruption, molestation and disturbance of a religious society is sufficient to sustain a conviction. (Neb.) 235. A church organization may make rules by which the admission and expulsion of its members are to be regulated, and the members must conform to these rules. Id.

Death penalty. The Legislature may change the manner of inflicting the death penalty. (N. Y.) 715. Evidence is not admissible to show that, in executing a law, some constitutional provision may possibly be violated. Id.

The comparative humanity of different systems of executing the death penalty on a criminal is a question for legislative determination. Id.

Removal of cause. The marriage of parties in another State does not furnish a ground for removal of indictments against them for fornication into the United States court. (Ga.) 50.

GENERAL INDEX

TO

OPINIONS, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

(Separate Index to Notes precedes this.)

ABATEMENT. See ACTION OR SUIT, 7-9. NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Abatement; not effected by pendency of suit against joint trespasser. 272

ACCOUNTING. See PARTNERSHIP, 8, 9.

ACTION OR SUIT. See also INDIANS, 3; NUISANCES, 6, 7; PAYMENT, 2; WATER COMPANIES, 2.

1. The fact that distributees who have received a portion of the estate of the decedent, who contracted to procure covenantees to release a covenantor from his obligation, may be called upon to contribute towards the damages which may be recovered for the breach of such contract, will not preclude them from exercising their right as covenantees to enforce the covenant, where their liability will in no event be coextensive with their claim, and there is no means of determining what such liability will be. Wood v. Bullard (Mass.) 804

2. Taxpayers may maintain suits against town officers to prevent or remedy misapplication of town funds. Russell v. Tate (Ark.) 180

3. Heirs entitled to a third of certain lands, who claim no more than that part, which is set off by metes and bounds, may sue therefor without joining other heirs, where the latter have already received a conveyance of a part, equivalent to their share. McQuerry v. Gilliland (Ky.) 454

4. The person in whom the legal title to property is vested in trust for a married woman is a necessary party to a bill seeking to charge the property with the payment of money paid to her. Prentiss v. Paisley (Fla.) 640

5. A railroad company, by appearing for any other purpose than to object to jurisdiction, submits itself to the jurisdiction of the court, and waives an objection that the action is brought in the wrong county, contrary to Ohio Rev. Stat. § 5027. Ohio S. R. Co. v. Morey (Ohio) 701

6. The word "trespass," in Texas statutes allowing an action for trespass to be brought in the county where it was committed, or where the defendant has his domicile, includes actions of trespass on the case. Hill v. Kimbell (Tex.) 618

7. A stockholder's liability to creditors for failure to make and record the certificate of payment of all the capital stock, as required by the New York Act of 1875, is not penal, and 7 L. R. A.

survives his death. Cochran v. Matthiessen (N. Y.) 558

8. The mere pendency of a suit against the lessee of a wharf, for injuries caused by its defective condition, will not abate a subsequent suit against the owner of the wharf. State, Bashe, v. Boyce (Md.) 272

9. The death of one of two physicians sued as partners in an action for damages for unskillful treatment, and the abatement of the action as to him, does not abate it as to the survivor. Hess v. Lourey (Ind.) 90

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Application of doctrine of proximate cause to actions arising ex delicto and ex contractu. 78

Contract by agent; who may sue on. 578

ADEMPTION. See WILLS, 11.

ADOPTION. See WILLS, 8.

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. The possession by a wife of land under a parol gift from her husband is not adverse to his mortgagee while the husband resides with her upon the land. Gafford v. Strouss (Ala.) 568

2. There is no adverse holding by the grantee of land during the life of the grantor, against the dower right of the grantor's wife, who did not join in the conveyance; but it is otherwise in the case of a disseisor who has acquired title by adverse possession as against the husband during his lifetime. Winters v. De Turk (Pa.) 658

AFFIDAVIT. See OATH AND AFFIDAVIT.

ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS.

1. An alteration may be made in an instrument by words added thereto which are not literally incorporated in the body thereof. Sanders v. Bagwell (S. C.) 748

2. An addendum written below the signatures on a sealed note bearing interest at 7 per cent, saying, "The above note is to be accounted for, with interest at 8 per cent per annum," and signed by the principal obligor on the note,—constitutes a material alteration which will avoid the note as against a surety thereon who did not consent to the alteration. Id.

3. Any valid contract between the payee and the principal, by which the terms of the original note are altered in any material particular, whether prejudicial to the surety or not, will vitiate the note as to him, if made without his consent. Sanders v. Bagwell (S.C.) 743

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Alteration of instruments; effect of; immaterial; effect on surety. 743

ANIMALS.

1. The right of a person whom a dog has suddenly assaulted, to kill the dog, under R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 93, § 6, need not be exercised instantly, but the person has a right to go for a weapon and return and kill the dog. Spaight v. McGovern (R. I.) 838

2. The fact that a person assaulted by a dog followed it into the shop of a third person and killed it there does not make him liable to the owner of the dog, where the statute gave him a right to kill it. Id.

3. A man bitten in consequence of his interference between two dogs to separate them is not suddenly assaulted, within the meaning of R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 93, § 6, so as to give him the right to kill the dog. Id.

ANNUITY. See also INSOLVENCY AND ASSIGNMENT FOR CREDITORS, 2, 3.

Where for a number of years the income from an estate was insufficient to pay in full an annuity payable out of the income, a surplus in subsequent years, when such income was more than sufficient, should be applied in satisfaction of the previous deficiencies, and not be paid to the next of kin. Re Ohauncey (N. Y.) 861

APPEAL AND ERROR.

I. NOTICE; RECORD; EXCEPTIONS.

II. HEARING AND DETERMINATION.

III. EFFECT OF DECISION.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

I. NOTICE; RECORD; EXCEPTIONS.

1. Notice of appeal to coparties need not be given, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 635, where no judgment is rendered against them and they have no interest in the appeal. Koons v. Mellett (Ind.) 281

2. An appeal in a suit by the creditor of a legatee against him and the administrator to reach money in the latter's hands is not subject to the provisions of Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 2454, 2455, respecting appeals in proceedings for settlement of decedents' estates. Id.

3. Only one point or subject should be embraced in an assignment of error. Kelly v. Bennett (Pa.) 120

4. A special question withdrawn from the jury by consent of both parties before the general verdict was rendered cannot be considered on appeal as part of the findings and verdict, even if the word "Yes" is written under it. Read v. Nichols (N. Y.) 180

5. An exception to "refusals to charge as requested" is not sufficiently definite, where some of the requests were given as requested, others modified, and some refused. Id.

6. No exception is, by the Idaho statute, allowed to an order overruling a challenge to a juror for general cause. Territory v. Evans (Id.) 646

7. A statement in a bill of exceptions, that the court refused to give certain numbered instructions asked by defendant, to which refusal of the instructions thus asked the defendant by his counsel then and there excepted at the time, will entitle defendant to have such refused instructions considered on appeal, and will not be treated as a general exception to the refusal of the instructions as a whole. Weber v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. (Mo.) 819

II. HEARING AND DETERMINATION.

8. Controverted questions of fact cannot be considered on appeal from the Appellate Court of Illinois, although the court has not expressly found, in terms, against appellant on those questions, and portions of its opinion are inconsistent with and negative the presumption of such a finding. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Lathrop (Ill.) 474

9. The refusal of the court to grant a nonsuit is not assignable as error. Kelly v. Bennett (Pa.) 120

10. An objection that a contract is void upon its face for uncertainty cannot be raised for the first time on appeal. Hodges v. Kowing (Conn.) 87

11. If no improper testimony affecting the subject of damages has been admitted, and the court has given to the jury proper instructions, the amount of damages awarded is beyond the reach of a writ of error. Hunn v. Michigan C. R. Co. (Mich.) 500

12. Permitting a witness to answer a question as to what he did on a certain occasion, over an objection that it calls for a conclusion or opinion, is not reversible error where the court subsequently strikes out of the answer all that portion which states a conclusion or opinion. Pennsylvania Co. v. Marien (Ind.) 687

13. Where the law makes the judge the trier of facts in cases to which the constitutional right of trial by jury does not extend, as has been done in contested election cases, his findings of fact are as conclusive on appeal as the verdict of a jury. Jones v. Glidewell (Ark.) 831

14. Although the supreme court will not attempt to ascertain where the weight or the preponderance of the evidence lies in a contested election case, it will determine whether or not a given finding is sustained by the testimony. Id.

15. The conclusion of law to be deduced from a special finding of facts is a question to be finally determined by the supreme court. Id.

16. Error in overruling demurrers to certain paragraphs of an answer is immaterial where the same evidence could be introduced and the same facts found under the general denial as under those paragraphs of the answer, and there is a special finding of facts which controls the judgment. Walling v. Burgess (Ind.) 481

17. Permitting incompetent evidence tending to support a finding to go to the jury over objection will cause a reversal of the judgment, where the other evidence in support of such finding is not of a satisfactory character. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Olem (Ind.) 588

18. A reversal for the admission of irrelevant evidence, where the court tried the case, will not be made unless it appears that the evidence was relied upon. White v. White (Cal.) 799

19. An objectionable instruction as to the credit and weight of the testimony of interested witnesses is not cause for reversal where there is no serious conflict between the appellant and any other witness, and nothing to show that it applied to him more than to the other party, who also testified. Hess v. Lowrey (Ind.) 90

20. Instructions which are lengthy and in the nature of a résumé of the evidence and an argument, do not constitute reversible error, if they are not so unfair to appellant as to have prejudiced the jury. Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Lathrop (Ill.) 474

21. Excluding evidence is not reversible error where the excluded evidence is subsequently admitted. Pennsylvania Co. v. Marien (Ind.) 687

22. The fact that a party is compelled to close his case before all his witnesses have been examined is not reversible error, where the time for taking testimony was limited at his request, in order that a decision might be reached before the adjournment of the term, and he was allowed more time than he said he would require when the date for closing the trial was fixed, especially where he does not show that any material evidence was thereby lost. Jones v. Glidewell (Ark.) 831

23. No reversal will be granted for the allowance of leading questions unless there has been a manifest abuse of discretion. White v. White (Cal.) 799

24. Want of a finding will not warrant a reversal where the evidence would not have justified a finding in favor of the complaining party. Id.

25. A judgment will not be reversed for error in a conclusion of law stated by the lower court, if a proper judgment is rendered upon the facts found by it. White v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. (Ind.) 257

26. Rendering judgment for a sum in excess of that covered by the prayer of the complaint is not ground for reversal, where it does not exceed the amount due, as the complaint might have been amended if the objection had been made in the lower court. Ke-tuh-s-mun-guah v. McClure (Ind.) 782

III. EFFECT OF DECISION.

27. An action sounding in tort cannot be maintained to recover damages for injuries resulting to lands by reason of the casting of surface water thereon through a drain which was constructed in good faith in accordance with a judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the parties and subject matter, although such judgment has been subsequently reversed on appeal for error, no stay of proceedings pending the 7 L. R. A.

appeal having been obtained. Thompson v. Reasoner (Ind.) 495

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Appeal and error; parties. 231

APPEARANCE. See ACTION OR SUIT, 5.

ARBITRATION. See also ATTORNEYS, 1-3.

A dispute as to the ownership of a strip of land 108 feet wide, claimed by each party in fee simple under a deed which includes the strip, cannot be settled by arbitration, under How. (Mich.) Stat. § 8475, which allows arbitration to settle boundaries of lands, but not to determine a claim to any estate in fee or for life. Lang v. Salliotte (Mich.) 720

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Arbitration; determination of land titles. 720

Power of attorney to submit case to. 563

ARREST.

1. A mere suspicion that a woman walking on the street in the night is playing the vocation of a prostitute will not justify her arrest, without a warrant, without any act on her part indicating that such is her purpose. Pinkerton v. Verberg (Mich.) 507

2. Being saucy to an officer, or daring him to arrest after he has threatened to arrest without warrant or any right to do so, will not justify him in making the arrest. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Arrest for one purpose will not justify detention and prosecution for another. 817

Evidence to establish character of accused. 507

ASSIGNMENT.

The right to assign a contract, under Iowa Code, § 2084, giving the assignee a right of action in his own name, does not permit one who has ordered machines agreeing to give his own notes therefor, and turn over as collateral any notes taken by him from purchasers, to assign the contract so as to substitute another in his stead whose note must be accepted in lieu of his own. Rappleys v. Racine Seeder Co. (Iowa) 139

ASSIGNMENT FOR CREDITORS.

See INSOLVENCY AND ASSIGNMENT FOR CREDITORS.

ASSOCIATIONS. See CORPORATIONS, 25.

ATTACHMENT.

1. Where a man has a settled abode for the time being in another State for the purpose of business or pleasure, he is a nonresident, within the meaning of the California attachment law. Hanson v. Graham (Cal.) 127

2. The ratification of the act of an attorney in bringing an unauthorized attachment suit will not relate back to the time of the commencement of the suit, so as to give the attachment lien priority over the liens of third parties which have been acquired in good faith during the interval between the bringing of the suit and the ratification. Carruth-Byrnes Hardware Co. v. Deere (Ark.) 405

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Affidavit by a stranger; ratification by principal. 405

ATTORNEYS.

1. An attorney has no implied authority to submit a case in which he is employed, to arbitration by a submission made in pais, without order or direction of the court or the knowledge of his client. Daniels v. New London (Conn.) 563

2. A material change in a submission to arbitration, made by the parties by an act in pais, is not within the authority of an attorney, unless he is expressly authorized to make it. Id.

3. A change in a written submission to arbitration by which the award is to be made final, instead of being returned to court for judgment by the court, is a material change such as an attorney cannot make unless expressly authorized. Id.

4. A lawyer cannot be held liable for a mistake in reference to a matter in which members of the profession possessed of reasonable skill and knowledge may differ as to the law, until it has been settled in the courts; nor if he is mistaken in a point of law on which reasonable doubt may be entertained by well-informed lawyers. Citizens Loan, F. & Sav. Assn. v. Friedley (Ind.) 669

5. A lawyer upon whose advice a mortgage was taken in 1883, executed by a husband and wife upon lands held by them as tenants by entireties, to secure the husband's debt, cannot be held liable for the loss occasioned by the death of the husband and the defeat by the wife of a foreclosure suit upon the ground that she signed as surety for her husband, although it was well settled when the mortgage was executed that the wife's signature was void, since it was not decided until 1884 that such mortgage was void as to both husband and wife. Id.

1. A bank is put upon inquiry as to the right of an executrix to transfer stock in the bank to herself as an individual, by a proposal 7 L. R. A.

to make such transfer as security for her indorsement of the note of another; and if the bank relies upon the statement of the maker of the note as to her ownership, instead of consulting the will, and the transfer by the executrix was unauthorized, it can claim no lien as security for such indorsement against those who are entitled to the stock under the will. Peck v. Bank of America (R. I.) 896

2. A bank with which a customer has left for collection his draft upon a party residing at a distant point is liable for the failure and default of a correspondent to whom it forwarded the draft for collection. Striegnitz v. National German Am. Bank (Minn.) 863

3. A bank which pays forged checks purporting to have been drawn by one of its depositors, to other banks which had in good faith advanced money on them to the forger, must, as between itself and the other banks, bear the loss, especially where the depositor lived near, and the checks continued to be presented and paid for several months before the forgery was discovered. Deposit Bank v. Fayette Nat. Bank (Ky.) 849

4. A bank which has charged up to the drawer, canceled, and sent a draft in payment of, a check received through the agency of two other banks which had successively received it for collection, the latter of which, not knowing that the former was not the owner thereof, as the payee's indorsement was in blank, had given credit therefor, reserving the right to charge it back if dishonored, and thereupon sent it on for collection and remittance,—cannot, at the request of the drawer and payee of the check, stop payment of the draft to the correspondent bank because the bank first receiving the check for collection had become insolvent. The insolvent bank only is the agent of the payee of the check, and the drawee, after sending the draft, is not justified in refusing payment, for the benefit of such payee, even assuming that he is entitled to the proceeds thereof. Corn Bank v. Farmers Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 530

5. Only the first of several banks successively receiving a check for collection is the agent of the payee. Id.

6. The title to commercial paper payable on demand, which is sent by one bank to another for collection and so indorsed, does not pass to the latter bank prior to its collection, although it is accompanied by a letter stating that it is sent "for collection and credit," and its amount is credited upon the account of the transmitting bank immediately upon its receipt by the collecting bank, in pursuance of a custom existing between the two banks in regard to their dealings. National Butchers & D. Bank v. Hubbell (N. Y.) 803

7. The assignee of a bank holding such paper uncollected takes no title thereto, and if he collects the same it is his duty to remit the proceeds to the transmitting bank; and the fact that he has expended such proceeds in the payment of the debts of his assignor in good faith, without notice of the claim of the transmitting bank, and under an order of court for the payment of a dividend to creditors, is no defense to a suit by the latter to recover them. Id.

8. As to the proceeds of the paper collected by the bank before its assignment and paid out by it in the usual course of its business in payment of its debts, the transmitting bank occupies a position no different from that of other creditors of the assigning bank, where its custom was to remit the proceeds of such collections once a week, and the identical moneys collected upon the paper were not expected to be sent to the transmitting bank. Id.

9. It is not such laches on the part of the transmitting bank to fail for sixteen days after the recording of the assignment to give notice of its claim and make demand upon the assignee for the proceeds of the paper belonging to it as will bar its right of action to recover them from the assignee; especially where there was no reason to suppose that he would use its money to pay his assignor's debts. Id.

BILLS AND NOTES. See also ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS, 2; INDIANS, 2.

1. That an instrument may be a promissory note it must contain on its face an express promise to pay money. Hence an instrument in the following form: "I. O. U. the sum of $17.05 for value received," signed by the maker, is not a promissory note. Gay v. Rooks (Mass.) 892

2. The provision in a promissory note for attorneys' fees of a fixed and definite amount, in case the note is collected by suit, is not contrary to public policy and therefore void, although courts might interfere to prevent oppression or collusion. Exchange Bank v. Tuttle (N. M.) 445

3. A provision in a note for a percentage of the amount due, as attorneys' fees "on suit by himself or an attorney employed," destroys its negotiability, under Cal. Civ. Code, § 3068, providing that "negotiable instruments must be without any condition not certain of fulfillment." Adams v. Seaman (Cal.) 824

4. Indulgence to a debtor by extending the time for payment for a certain period is a valuable consideration for a note for the same debt, as against a surety on the note. Ponder v. Allen (S. C.) 745

5. One who signs a negotiable note perfect on its face, as surety for another, upon the condition, known only to the principal, that it is not to be delivered to the payee until something else is done, will be liable on the note, even in the hands of the payee, if he has no notice of such condition, although the condition be not complied with. Id.

6. A note for value received, promising to pay a certain sum at the maker's "convenience and upon this express condition, that" he is "to be the sole judge of such convenience and time of payment," may be enforced by an action, after the expiration of a reasonable time, on demand and refusal of payment. It does not give the maker the sole right to say when it would suit his convenience to pay it. Smithers v. Junker (C. C. N. D. Ill.) 264

7. A statement or recital in a note that it is given for the privilege of hanging advertising signs in street cars for three months from a certain subsequent date will not destroy its negotiability. Siegel v. Chicago Trust & Sav. Bank (Ill.) 537

8. Indorsees of a note are not put upon inquiry as to a subsequent failure of consideration, by a statement or recital in the note that it is given for the privilege of hanging advertising signs in street cars after a certain subsequent date. Id.

9. Letters by the holder of drafts indorsed in blank, to a bank with which he had rediscounted them, referring to his account and to the drafts as "discounts" and "acceptances" of the drawer, are not notice that such holder is not the absolute owner. German Nat. Bank v. Coors (Colo.) 845

10. A bona fide purchaser of drafts indorsed in blank for the purpose of collection has a good title without regard to prior equities between the owner and the collecting agent. Id.

11. A telegram stating that "Tate is good. Send on your paper,"—sent by a bank in reply to an inquiry as to whether or not it would pay such person's check for a certain amount, constitutes a written acceptance of such check which will render the bank liable for its amount to a holder thereof who was shown the telegram and took the check for value in reliance thereon. Garretson v. North Atchison Bank (C. C. W. D. Mo.) 423

12. A letter from one expecting a consignment of goods for sale on commission, to a bank, stating that the writer will honor the consignor's drafts with bill of lading attached, must be read in the light of a usage of trade known to both parties, for the consignor to draw for an amount not exceeding three fourths of the value of the consigned goods, and will render the writer liable only for such amount. *Pike v. 2. A statutory liquor bond which must be approved by the town board, and then filed with the county treasurer, who has no discretion as to the filing, becomes operative on its approval and before filing, so as to make the sureties liable for the acts of the principal between the dates of the approval and the filing. *Brockway v. I. RIGHTS, DUTIES, AND LIABILITIES.

a. *As to Passengers.

1. The duty of common carriers with respect to the transportation of persons and property is independent of contract. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Trautwein (N. J.) 435

2. Knowledge of the unsafe condition of a platform provided by a carrier for loading stock will not prevent recovery for injuries to a person on attempting to use it for that purpose in the exercise of due care. White v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (Ky.) 44

3. A railway carrier must provide safe means of access to and from its stations for the use of passengers, and passengers have the right to assume that the means provided are reasonably safe. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Trautwein (N. J.) 435

4. A railway company is not absolved from the duty to keep a passageway held out by it for use to and from its depot reasonably safe, by the fact that another passageway is provided. Id.

5. A passenger is justified in using a passageway held out by the carrier as a means of entrance and exit from and to the public street; and it is immaterial whether the way is made and kept in repair by the carrier or other parties. Id.

6. Railway companies are bound to keep the platforms at their passenger stations in a safe condition for persons to enter and leave the cars; and failure to do so will render the company liable to persons injured, without fault on their part, on account of the defect. Pennsylvania Co. v. Marien (Ind.) 687

7. A passenger is not bound to abandon the use of a station platform which is not in good repair, and seek some other way of entering and leaving the cars, if it is still held out by the company as safe, and used by the public. Id.

8. The fact that a person may have seen a station platform out of repair at one time does not bind him to carry such defect in mind upon all future occasions when approaching or leaving a train at such place. Id.

9. Calling the name of a station, and stopping the train soon after to take a side track while another train passes, will not make the carrier liable for injuries to a passenger who attempts to get off at that place, where all the surroundings indicate that it is not the proper place for alighting. Smith v. Georgia P. R. Co. (Ala.) 323

10. While it is the duty of a railroad company to stop its train at a station to which it has contracted to carry a passenger, and to land him safely and conveniently, yet the fact that the company neglects its duty and the train passes the station without stopping does not justify a passenger in jumping from the moving train, unless expressly or impliedly invited to do so by the employes of the company. Walker v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. (La.) 111

b. *As to Freight.

11. A carrier's duty is not limited to the transportation of goods delivered for carriage.

and injury from any source, which may be averred and which in the exercise of care and ordinary intelligence may be known or anticipated. Beard v. Illinois C. R. Co. (Iowa) 280

12. A carrier that has accepted butter for transportation cannot escape liability for damage to the butter from the heat during transportation by the fact that it did not have refrigerator cars which were ready for use; at least when it could have been carried safely by the use of ice in the cars used. Id.

13. The sealing of a car containing butter when received from a connecting carrier is no excuse for failure to put ice in the car if necessary to protect the butter from the heat. Id.

14. The rate of charges as shown by the waybill of butter, if it does not express a contract to excuse the carrier from the exercise of the care required by law, although it is the rate for common cars, will not limit the care to be exercised by the carrier or restrict its liability. Id.

15. The penalty provided by the Texas statute for the refusal of a railroad company to deliver freight on payment or tender of the charges due as shown by the bill of lading applies only to a company which has itself executed, authorized, or ratified the execution of the bill of lading. Dwyer v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. (Tex.) 478

16. The exhibition of the bill of lading at the time of the tender of the charges and demand of the goods is not a condition precedent to the recovery of a penalty, under the Texas statute, for refusal to deliver the goods, although such penalty should be inflicted only for a willful disregard of the law. Id.

17. A common carrier waives his right to detain goods for the freight if he puts his refusal to deliver them to the owner upon the ground that they are not in his possession at the place where a demand is duly made. Adams Exp. Co. v. Harris (Ind.) 214

c. Contracts to Limit Liability.

18. A limitation of liability in the bill of lading will not control where the damage is an effect of the carrier's negligence, and where it does not appear that the limitation was in consideration of a lower rate of freight. Adams Exp. Co. v. Harris (Ind.) 214

19. To be valid, a contract restricting a carrier's liability must be fairly obtained, just, and reasonable. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilbert (Tenn.) 162

20. A condition in a bill of lading which limits the carrier's liability is reasonable if coupled with compensating advantages to the shipper, and the latter has the alternative of getting rid of the condition by paying a reasonably higher freight rate. Id.

21. A "fire clause" in a bill of lading, exempting the carrier from liability from loss by fire, is not valid where transportation under the rules of the common law is not offered as an alternative, and no reduction of rates is made as a consideration for the exemption. Id.

22. Mere acquiescence by shippers in the the reasonableness of the exemption, where the shippers have not had an opportunity of selecting between bills of lading with and those without this clause. Id.

d. Connecting Carriers.

23. An intermediate carrier can derive no benefit from a contract between the first carrier and the shipper, limiting the former's liability, which makes no provision for an extension of its benefits to any other than the first carrier. Adams Exp. Co. v. Harris (Ind.) 214

24. Where two connecting railroad companies use a station jointly, or hire one person to discharge the duties of ticket agent for both, and such person sells a ticket over one of the roads, the other company is not responsible for the negligence of the connecting road. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cochran (Kan.) 414

25. A carrier cannot be considered as ratifying the original contract of shipment for goods which it receives from another company and transports, when it is bound by statute to perform such service. Dwyer v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. (Tex.) 478

II. DISCRIMINATION IN RATES.

26. A corporation created by the State of Ohio, and engaged in carrying goods for hire as a common carrier, has no franchise, privilege, or right to discriminate in its freight rates in favor of one shipper, even when it is necessary to do so to secure his custom, if the discriminating rate will tend to create a monopoly by excluding from their proper markets the products of the competitors of the favored shipper. State, Kohler, v. Cincinnati, W. & B. R. Co. (Ohio) 319

CASES.

A miscarriage and serious impairment of the health of a woman occurring leased

CHATTEL MORTGAGE. See MORTGAGE, 7.

CHECKS. See also BANKS AND BANKING, 4, 5; EVIDENCE, 4; INTEREST, 3; NOVATION; PAYMENT, 1.

1. The purchaser of a check made payable to the drawer's own order, the certification of which has been procured by fraud, who by mistake of both himself and the payee takes it without the latter's indorsement, holds it subject to all defenses which the bank would have against it in the hands of the payee, even although he pays full value for it without notice of the fraud; and a subsequent indorsement made after the purchaser has received such notice will not render the check valid in his hands, at least in the absence of an express agreement to indorse made at the time of the transfer. Goshen Nat. Bank v. Bingham (N. Y.) 595

2. A bank is not estopped to deny its liability on a check which it has certified, even as against a bona fide holder for value who purchased upon the faith of the certification, where it has never been indorsed by the payee. Id.

3. A bank whose certification of a check has been procured by fraud cannot maintain an action to recover possession thereof against one who has purchased bona fide and for value from the payee, but who took it without the latter's indorsement. Id.

4. One who accepts a certified check in the usual course of business does not assume the risk of insolvency of the bank upon which it is drawn, but in case it proves insolvent he may look to the drawer for payment. Born v. Indianapolis First Nat. Bank (Ind.) 442

5. Presentation of a check for payment, and notice to the drawer of nonpayment, are unnecessary when the drawer has or leaves no funds on deposit for its payment at the time when it should be presented, or if he consents or agrees that the same shall not be presented for payment. Under such circumstances the drawer's liability becomes fixed at that time without presentation and notice, and whatever takes place afterwards in the state of his account at the bank will not change the rights of the parties. Culver v. Marks (Ind.) 489

6. Willingness on the part of the bank officials to pay a check for the payment of which there are no funds on deposit will not render the presentation of the check for payment necessary in order to charge the drawer. Id.

7. The acceptance of a check is necessary in order to give the holder a right of action thereon against the bank. Pickle v. People's Nat. Bank (Tenn.) 93

8. The acceptance of a check, so as to give a right of action to the payee, is inferred from the retention of the check by the bank, and a subsequent charge of the check to the drawer, although it was presented by and payment made to an unauthorized person. Id.

9. The payee of a check which never came into his hands, but which was paid to some person who had no right to collect it, or was left with the bank to be credited to him, and credit not given through mere oversight, by suing the bank upon it ratifies the receipt of the check from the drawer, as if it had been received by his agent for his use and benefit. Id.

11. There is no necessity to particularize, in a contract for the services of a ball player which gives the employer the right to "reserve" such player for the season next ensuing, the conditions or characteristics of the option, if, when the contract is made, the term has a well understood definition. Id.

12. A contract giving base ball clubs the right to "reserve" their players for another season simply gives the clubs the right, as against other clubs, to secure the services of such players if the parties can agree, but places no obligations on the players to enter into a contract for such season. Hence the players cannot be compelled to enter into such future contract by a decree of specific performance, and consequently they cannot be enjoined from entering into contracts with other clubs. Id.

13. A party to an illegal trust combination, who, in pursuance of the agreement, has furnished goods in the name of the trustee, cannot claim the proceeds as against a receiver of 7 L. R. A.

pointed. Pittsburgh Courier Co. v. McMillan (N. Y.) 46

14. The rule against granting relief to a party to an illegal contract does not apply to prevent a receiver from recovering the fruits of the transaction for the benefit of honest creditors. Id.

15. A negotiable note is not valid, even in the hands of a bona fide holder, where it was given in consideration of a wager contract, which is made a crime by statute, a transfer of such note to a party ignorant of its illegality being also made a crime, although the statute does not expressly declare that such notes shall be void in the hands of innocent holders. Snoddy v. American Nat. Bank (Tenn.) 705

III. RESCISSION; RELIEF.

16. Equity will not relieve from securities executed to shield a person from prosecution for a felony of which he is guilty, upon the ground that execution for such purpose rendered them void. Shattuck v. Watson (Ark.) 551

17. One who has executed and delivered securities in consideration of a promise to refrain from a prosecution for felony of a person guilty thereof cannot, after his illegal purpose has failed from causes other than a breach of the contract, and a prosecution has been commenced by third parties, rescind the contract and recover back the securities. Id.

IV. IMPAIRING OBLIGATION.

18. The prohibition against impairing the obligation of contracts, contained in U. S. Const. art. 1, § 10, applies to contracts establishing charitable trusts. Cary Library v. Bliss (Mass.) 765

19. The acceptance by a town of a proposition for the donation of a fund for the establishment of a public library, which contains a scheme for the management of the fund and library and the payment of the money in accordance therewith, constitutes a contract between the parties; and the scheme cannot afterwards be changed by the Legislature without the consent of all the parties to the contract,—at least not until the conditions existing at the time the contract was made become so changed as to make it impracticable or inconvenient to further carry out the original scheme. Id.

20. The contract of marriage is not a "contract," within the meaning of the provision in the Constitution of the United States prohibiting States from impairing the obligation of a contract. State v. Tutty (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 30

I. NATURE.

1. An association for the encouragement of debating, reading, and literature, and the enjoyment of rational social amusements, and the playing of tenpins, chess, and checkers, and other lawful games, having no pecuniary profit in view, and no connection with any business purposes or with politics, and which provides that no saloon shall be kept in connection therewith, and no drinks sold by the club or any of its members,—may be regarded as an educational association, entitled to be incorporated without the payment of a tax on capital stock, under Mo. Const. art. 10, § 21, and Mo. Rev. Stat. 1869, §§ 2821, 2825. State, Henderson, v. Le Sueur (Mo.) 784

II. POWERS, LIABILITIES, AND OFFICERS.

2. A corporation may execute a deed as an attorney in fact for another. Killingsworth v. Portland Trust Co. (Or.) 688

3. A person not a citizen of Pennsylvania who is a citizen of the United States can become a member of the Farmers & Mechanics Institute of Northampton County, Pennsylvania, there being no statutory or charter provision against his doing so; and such nonresident stockholder takes his shares with all the rights and privileges which pertain to them in the hands of a citizen, and he may vote upon them, and, where no other qualification than ownership of stock is required of the directors, may become a director. Detwiler v. Com. Dickinson (Pa.) 857

4. One who is not a citizen of the United States, but is, and for many years has been, a resident and property-holder in Pennsylvania, can become a stockholder, and is entitled to 7 L. R. A.

vote at the stockholders' meetings, and may be legally elected as a director, of a corporation founded under the Pennsylvania laws. Com. Robinson, v. Hemingway (Pa.) 860

5. A regulation of a corporation that stockholders shall have one vote for each share held by them up to ten shares, and fixing the proportion which his votes shall bear to his shares above that number, is a reasonable regulation, uniform in its operation, conflicts with no law, and is binding on all the shareholders. Detwiler v. Com. Dickinson (Pa.) 857

6. When the methods of voting are not fixed by general law, corporations may make a law for themselves, subject to the qualification that such laws and regulations as they make shall not conflict with the laws of the United States. Id.

7. A regulation of a corporation that votes may be cast by proxy is a reasonable regulation, uniform in its application, works no wrong to any shareholder, and conflicts with no law of Pennsylvania. Id.

8. By-laws of a corporation providing that when any director shall die, resign, neglect to serve, or remove out of the county, the board may proceed to supply the vacancy, do not authorize a director to be ousted on the ground of ineligibility. Id.

9. A railroad company which has acquired a majority of the stock of another railroad company will not be allowed, in the absence of express statutory authority, to vote such stock, either by itself or by other persons acting in its interest, in the election of officers or in matters pertaining to the management and control of the latter company; at least where the two roads are rivals having substantially the same field of operation, where a conflict of interest may arise in the matter of expenditure, or in the division of patronage or of earnings, or where the profits of one company may be enhanced by a diminution of those of the other. Memphis & O. R. Co. v. Woods (Ala.) 605

10. A railroad company in Kansas has the lawful right to purchase and hold stock of a connecting road. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cochran (Kan.) 414

11. A railroad company whose rights and powers in respect to a connecting road are merely those of a stockholder is not liable for the negligence of the connecting railroad. Id.

12. One employed by a corporation on a monthly salary, who is part of the time on the road selling goods, making collections, etc., as a drummer, and the rest of the time working in a store, shipping and receiving goods, moving and handling stock, etc., or making sales and collecting bills in the city,—is a "clerk," within the meaning of the Tennessee General Incorporation Act of 1875, § 11, making stockholders individually liable for moneys due "laborers, servants, clerks, and operatives" in case the corporation becomes insolvent. Cole v. Hand (Tenn.) 96

13. A by-law of a corporation providing for the removal of officers by the board of directors at pleasure constitutes part of the contract of employment of a secretary at a designated yearly salary, with no special agreement

III. STOCK AND STOCKHOLDERS.

14. An attempt to release a stockholder from his contract by the general manager of a corporation, who is also its largest stockholder, secretary, and treasurer, on the stockholder's request that he would dispose of his stock, whereby he causes entries to be made on the books charging off the balance due for unpaid calls, and crediting to the stockholder the sums paid by him, will not avail to release the stockholder where no attempt is made to transfer his shares, although the manager secures new subscriptions to the stock in place thereof, and both parties suppose that he is authorized to substitute new subscriptions and release the old ones. Cartwright v. Dickinson (Tenn.) 706

15. The fact that an overissue of stock will be the result where stock is issued to new subscribers as a substitute for stockholders who wish to withdraw, unless an attempted cancellation of the earlier subscriptions (made, with supposed authority, to effect such substitution) shall be upheld, will not aid such invalid attempt at cancellation. Id.

16. A stockholder who is misled by statements of the manager of the corporation, whom he has requested to dispose of his shares, to the effect that they have been sold, when in fact an invalid attempt to cancel them merely has been made, is not thereby released from his contract. If injured, his remedy is one against his agent, the manager. Id.

17. An assignee of a corporation who has not resigned his trust, where there are creditors whose claims he must provide for, is not prevented from bringing suit to enforce the liability of a stockholder by the fact that he has suffered the stockholders to resume business with the machinery assigned to him, taking a bond for its protection. Id.

18. The agreement of one who signs articles of association for the formation of a corporation, to take stock therein, does not become enforceable until he has acknowledged the articles as required by Ind. Rev. Stat. § 8851. Coppage v. Hutton (Ind.) 591

19. A stockholder of a railroad company is not liable for the negligence of the officers, agents, or employees of the company in the operation of its road. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cochran (Kan.) 414

20. An averment of refusal by the officers of a corporation, upon request, to take appropriate legal proceedings to prevent the unlawful voting of corporate stock, will authorize the entertainment of a suit by stockholders in their own names for the accomplishment of that object. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Woods (Ala.) 605

21. A demand on the trustees of a corporation to restore funds misapplied is not necessary before an action by a member to compel such restoration, where the trustees themselves were parties to the unlawful transaction, and contest the action on the ground that their acts were rightful. Ashton v. Dashaway Assn. (Cal.) 809

IV. DISSOLUTION.

22. A corporation violating the organic law 7 L. R. A.

its property. Com. Attorney-General, v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (Pa.) 634

23. Where a railroad company incorporated under the laws of Ohio misuses a franchise, privilege, or right conferred upon it, or claims the right to exercise, or has exercised, "a franchise, privilege, or right in contravention of law," the supreme court has jurisdiction to inquire into and correct the mischief, though the corporation may be engaged in interstate commerce, and the misuser or usurpation to be corrected relate to and concern that traffic. State, ex rel, v. Cincinnati, W. & B. R. Co. (Ohio) 819

24. Where a corporation fixes a rate of freight per hundred pounds, for carrying petroleum oil in tank cars, substantially lower than its rate for transporting it in barrels in car-load lots, it is exercising "a franchise, privilege, or right in contravention of law," within the meaning of Ohio Rev. Stat. § 6761, cl. 4. Id.

25. The donation by trustees of an incorporated benevolent association to each member, in pursuance of a unanimous vote of the members present at a meeting when the vote was taken, of a certain sum for past services, when no services had been rendered other than such as the parties were bound to render as members, is a misappropriation of corporate funds, the restoration of which may be compelled by a member who was not a party to the transaction. Ashton v. Dashaway Assn. (Cal.) 809

V. FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

26. A foreign corporation owning all the stock of a domestic corporation, where the statutes allow its stock to be held by other corporations, does not thereby "acquire or hold" the real estate of the domestic corporation so as to violate the Pennsylvania Act of April 26, 1855, against acquiring or holding real estate "directly in the corporate name, or by or through any trustee or other device whatsoever, unless specially authorized," under penalty of escheat. Com. Attorney-General, v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (Pa.) 634

1. A contract by which a board of county commissioners attempts to employ a legal adviser for a period of three years, to commence three months in the future and after the time for the election of a person to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of office of one member of the board, the term of employment extending over a period during which all the members of the board as constituted at the time of the contract will retire therefrom unless re-elected,—is against public policy and void. Jay County v. Taylor (Ind.) 160

2. The county of Cascade, under the Montana Act of Sept. 12, 1887, providing that it "shall be liable for and shall pay the sum of $30,000" to the county of Choteau, from which it was created, giving it the option to cause warrants to be issued, which on being indorsed, "Not paid for want of funds," shall bear interest, or to issue coupon bonds and sell them,—cannot discharge the debt by delivery of the bonds, but, if it issues the bonds, must convert them into cash and pay the debt. Territory, Choteau County, v. Cascade County (Mont.) 105

3. When the law itself imposes a duty on county commissioners as such, and they are not appointed thereto by the county, the county will not be responsible for their breach of duty, or for their nonfeasance or misfeasance in relation to such duty. Id.

1. An action on a contract is within the jurisdiction of the courts of the State in which is the place of performance, although the parties are residents of other States. Osfrode v. Gartner (Mich.) 511

2. Consent of the parties is sufficient to give jurisdiction over them to a court which has jurisdiction of the subject matter. Id.

3. A court has no discretion to refuse to hear a case between nonresidents of which it has jurisdiction, merely because the suit is brought there only for convenience of parties and attorneys, and will entail expense upon the county. Id.

4. The inability of the beneficiary under a will to bring suit for conveyance of land to him as directed by the will, in the State where the land is situated, because the will is not recorded there, will not prevent after his death) from bringing the suit in another State where the will is recorded. Querry v. Gilliland (Ky.)

5. A suit to restrain a deed in order to prevent a one "involving title to real estate" is within the jurisdiction of the Missouri courts. Gardner v. Terry (Mo.)

6. An Act providing for the appointment of commissioners of the courts to assist in the performance of judicial functions under such rules and court may adopt," is not unconstitutional. Hayne (Cal.)

7. Commissioners "to not usurp judicial functions, but to assist in the performance of judicial power, by taking and reporting the result of their proceedings, with opinions and suggestions, for the consideration of the courts," is not unconstitutional.

8. The possibility that the courts may be unduly influenced by the reports of commissioners appointed to assist in the performance of the Act providing for their appointment, it is shown that they are not unconstitutional.

DAMAGES. See also TELEGRAPH COMPANIES, 5.

1. Damages for an alleged negligent construction of a sewer, in consequence of which plaintiff's premises are injured by discharge therefrom, must be limited to the actual damage sustained up to the time of bringing suit, and cannot include prospective damages, on the ground that the defects are permanent, although human labor will be necessary to remedy the defects. Nashville v. Conner (Tenn.) 465

2. A railroad cannot be made responsible for exemplary damages on account of injuries done by one of its servants, even though the act was wanton and malicious, unless the act was expressly or impliedly authorized or ratified by the company. Ricketts v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (W. Va.) 354

3. In proceedings to assess damages for the taking of property for railroad purposes, whatever injuriously affects the owner's adjoining property as the direct and necessary result of the location of the road may be considered by the jury in making their assessment. Schuyt-kill River E. S. R. Co. v. Kersey (Pa.) 409

4. Where the location of a railroad across property leased as a coal yard makes necessary new appliances for the continuation of the coal business, and increases the cost of raising and storing the coal, as well as the breakage and waste in handling it, the additional expense and loss, together with the cost of the new appliances, may properly be received in evidence in a proceeding by the lessee to recover damages for such location, not as specific items of claim, but as affecting the market value of the leasehold. Id.

5. The benefits which will accrue to property by reason of the construction of a railroad must necessarily be considered in determining the amount of the consequential damages to be allowed to its owner on account of such construction, and their consideration for such purpose is not prohibited by the statute which forbids commissioners, in determining the compensation to be made to owners of property acquired for the construction of railroads, to make any allowance or deduction on account of any real or supposed benefits which the party in interest may derive from the construction of the proposed road. Newman v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. (N.Y.) 289

6. The damages to abutting-property owners by reason of the destruction of their easements for ingress and egress to and from a public street, and the free circulation of light and air therefrom to their property, by the construction of an elevated railroad in such street, are entirely consequential; and in determining the amount to be awarded therefor the jury may consider the benefits as well as the injuries resulting from such construction. Id.

7. In an action by a lessee of property abutting upon a street through which an elevated railroad is constructed, to recover damages for the permanent impairment of his easement in the street for light, air, and access, the general appreciation of the value of property consequent upon such improvement cannot be considered, as it belongs to the property-owner, but special and peculiar advantages which tend to increase the rental value of the property are elements which the jury must consider in determining the amount of their award. Id.

8. Damages for loss of services of plaintiff's wife by reason of personal injuries are not confined to the value of her services within the household, but may include the value of her services as manager of her husband's business, where she was thus engaged at the time of the injury, without any contract or expectation of pay for her services. Citizens Street R. Co. v. Twinn (Ind.) 353

9. In an action by a father to recover for the loss of services of his minor child by reason of injuries inflicted upon him by a third person, which result in his death, the recovery must be limited to the damages which accrued during the period between the injury and the death, and cannot embrace those accruing after the death occurred. Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Ark.) 268

10. Two thousand dollars damages was awarded for the death of plaintiff's son, between eighteen and nineteen years of age, who was robust, earning $25 per month, and who was a dutiful son employing his wages for the benefit of his father's family. Myhan v. Louisiana Electric Light & P. Co. (La.) 172

DEATH.

1. An administrator has no right, under the Massachusetts Employers' Liability Act (Mass. Laws 1887, chap. 270), to recover damages on account of the death of his intestate from injuries caused by the employers' negligence, in addition to his right as legal representative to recover the damages which accrued to the intestate in his lifetime. Ramodell v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Mass.) 154

2. The Arkansas Act of 1888 does not take away the right which survives to the personal representative by Mansf. (Ark.) Dig. § 5223, to recover upon the cause of action for injuries which accrued by the common law to an injured party in his lifetime; nor does it deprive a father of his right to maintain his common-law action for loss of services of his minor child. Therefore in case of the death of a minor the three actions may be prosecuted at the same time and recoveries had in each and all of them. Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Ark.) 288

8. The Arkansas Act of 1883 (Mansf. Dig. §§ 5225, 5226) embodying the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act in regard to suits to recover damages for death resulting from the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, applies to all cases in which a recovery may be had under that Act, regardless of the agency by which the injury was inflicted, and supercedes the Act of 1875 relating to suits for injuries by railway trains. Hence such suits must be brought by the personal representative for the benefit of the widow and next of kin. Id.

1. The taking of money by a private corporation created to administer a public charity is not a taking of property for a public use which may be authorized under the power of eminent domain. Cary Library v. Bliss (Mass.) 765

2. The taking of property which is held by one person for a public use by another person, to be held in the same manner for precisely the same public use, is not a matter of such public necessity that it can be authorized by the Legislature under the power of eminent domain. Id.

3. A mere change in the use of land from agricultural to city purposes is not taking private property for public use. Callen v. Junction City (Kan.) 786

4. A statute requiring any railroad company to build, at its own expense, a crossing for any individual whose residence is separated by the railroad from a public highway, is, if such crossing is to be considered as for a public use, unconstitutional in taking the property of the company for public use without compensation. People v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. (Mich.) 717

5. The owners of land taken under the provisions of Mass. Acts 1884, chap. 290, authorizing the taking of certain lands for the use of the Commonwealth, are not, by filing a petition L. R. A.

proceedings to dispute the validity of the taking and test the constitutionality of the Act, at least if they have not voluntarily proceeded to judgment upon their petition. Moore v. Sanford (Mass.) 151

6. Although the determination of the Legislature is not conclusive that a purpose for which it directs property to be taken is a public use, yet it is conclusive, if the use is public, that a necessity exists which requires the property to be taken. Id.

7. The reclamation of flats situated upon Boston Harbor and substantially useless in their original condition, for the avowed purpose of improving the harbor and of providing better and more complete accommodations for the railroad and commercial interests of the city of Boston, by filling such flats with solid earth, is a matter of such public benefit that the flats may be taken by the Commonwealth for such purpose, under the power of eminent domain, notwithstanding a possible pecuniary benefit to the Commonwealth may be contemplated by the sale of the flats when filled. Hence Mass. Acts 1884, chap. 290, which provides for such taking, is not unconstitutional as authorizing the taking of land for a use not public. Id.

8. The specific mention of and including in the same petition riparian rights in respect to other lands belonging to other persons does not affect the construction of the petition and proceedings in respect to the land in question. Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 722

9. A clause of a charter authorizing land to be taken, which makes the corporation "accountable to the owners thereof for all damages," does not include consequential injuries. Brooks v. Cedar Brook & S. C. R. Imp. Co. (Me.) 460

10. Incidental injuries to land by the washing away of the soil of the banks and bottom of a stream, caused by a reasonable increase of the flow of water at certain times, produced by a dam authorized by the Legislature to facilitate the driving of logs, is not a taking of the property of a riparian owner for which compensation is necessary. Id.

11. The building by a railroad company, of a side track in a street along and upon which it has a right of way and has a single track in operation, constitutes no additional burden upon property abutting upon the street, for which damages may be recovered by its owner, where the statutes enabled the company to locate its tracks upon the street and to appropriate a right of way 6 rods wide, and it gave notice that its appropriation would be made "in as full and ample and perfect a manner as may be required" for railroad purposes, and it paid the assessed damages, which were duly accepted. White v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. (Ind.) 267

12. The construction of a telegraph and telephone line on a railroad company's right of way imposes an additional servitude or burden on the land, for which the owners are entitled to compensation, unless it is constructed by the railroad company in good faith for its own use and benefit in the operation of the road and to facilitate its business, or is reasonably necessary for that purpose. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Smith (Md.) 200

18. The use of electricity by a street-railway company as a motive power will not render its use of the street an imposition of an additional servitude thereon, which will require the making of additional compensation therefor to the owner of the fee, where it does not appear that the occupation of the street is any more exclusive than though the road was operated by horse-power. Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co. (R. I.) 205

EQUITY.

1. A suit by a vendor for specific performance of a fair contract for the sale of land cannot be defeated on the ground that there is a remedy at law. Hodges v. Kowing (Conn.) 87

2. A remedy at law, to defeat a suit in equity, must be as complete and beneficial as the latter. Id.

3. Where an illegal appropriation has been made by a town council and warrants drawn thereon, some of which have been paid, equity has jurisdiction of a suit to cancel the unpaid warrants, to compel repayment of the money paid, and to annul the appropriation; and the recalling and cancellation of the unpaid warrants after suit is brought will not oust the jurisdiction. In such case the court may grant affirmative, as well as injunctive, relief. Russell v. Tate (Ark.) 180

II. PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

3. The presumption that when a connection between parties is illicit it continues as it began, whether it is a presumption of fact or of law, is rebuttable. White v. White (Cal.) 799

4. The possession by a bank of a check which is not indorsed does not raise a presumption that it was paid to the payee named therein, when such payment is denied by the payee, and the only other proof of payment is a custom of the bank to pay checks without indorsement only when presented by the payee. Pickle v. People's Nat. Bank (Tenn.) 93

5. Checks dated at a certain place and drawn upon the "First National Bank" will be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, to have been drawn upon the first national bank of such place, where it appears that such bank exists and no other bank or place appears on the check. *Culver v. 2. The sale of a deceased partner's interest in partnership real estate is authorized by a will giving power to settle, adjust, and compromise all debts owing by the testator, to make settlements with his former partners, and to sell and convey any or all of his real estate in order to pay and satisfy debts against his estate. Valentine v. Wyor (Ind.) 786

3. An executor may convey his testator's interest in partnership real estate to his surviving partner, in consideration of an agreement by the latter to pay partnership debts, where the will authorizes him to make settlements with testator's partners of all matters pertaining to the partnership business, to adjust, settle, and compromise all debts, claims, and demands against the estate, and in his discretion to sell and convey so much of the testator's real estate as should be deemed necessary to satisfy his debts. Id.

INDICTMENT, INFORMATION, AND COMPLAINT.

An information charging that defendants "did willfully, maliciously, and unlawfully interrupt, molest, and disturb a religious meeting" and its members, sufficiently describes the manner of disturbance, under Neb. Crim. Code, § 83. Jones v. State (Neb.) 825

INFANTS.

The court of chancery in Maryland had no jurisdiction in 1859 to order the sale of city real estate for the payment of taxes and street assessments, upon the joint petition of the life tenant and the infant remainderman suing by next friend, but for whom no guardian was appointed, and who was not made defendant or summoned to answer the bill, although it was alleged that "it would be for the interest and advantage of all parties concerned." Roche v. Waters (Md.) 533

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Infants; sale of lands by court. 534

INJUNCTION.

1. A mortgagee will have the security of his lien protected by injunction. Betz v. Verner (N. J.) 690

2. An injunction may be granted to prevent drawing down the water of a pond below its natural low-water line, where defendants avow an intention to do so whenever, in times of drought, the water is needed, and have already lowered it to some extent, although the damages have thus far been nominal only. Fernald v. Knox Woolen Co. (Me.) 459

3. Pollution of the waters, and injury to the flow of the current, of a creek by discharging into it the manure and offal from extensive cattle-feeding barns, in such manner and degree as to injure the stream for husbandry, and destroy it for watering livestock on adjacent premises, will be restrained by injunction, although the complainant might be able to supply water for his cattle from an independent source at a comparatively small cost. Barton v. Union Cattle Co. (Neb.) 457

4. An injunction may be granted to prevent a sale of land under a deed of trust, in order to prevent a cloud being cast thereby on the title, which has been obtained by adverse possession. Gardner v. Terry (Mo.) 67

5. The negative enforcement of a contract for personal services by an injunction will not be made where the services are not purely intellectual, peculiar, or individual in their character. William Rogers Mfg. Co. v. Rogers (Conn.) 779

6. A contract for the employment of a person for such services as shall be devolved upon him by the general manager of the business, including such duties as traveling or acting as secretary or other officer of the company, if required of him, does not show that his services are so peculiar or individual that they cannot be performed by any person of ordinary intelligence and fair learning, so as to authorize an injunction in aid of the specific performance of the contract. Id.

7. An agreement by an employé not to allow his name to be used in any business similar to that of his employer will not, if the latter does not own the name as a trademark, authorize an injunction against his engaging with his employer's competitor, and allowing him the use of his name, at least if it is not shown that the employer uses, or is entitled to use, such name, or that the use of it by rivals would do him some special injury. Id.

8. Although equity will not ordinarily attempt to enforce contracts which cannot be carried out by the machinery of a court, it may nevertheless practically accomplish the same end by enjoining the breach of a negative promise; and this will be done whenever the contract is one of which the court would decree specific performance if by such decree its observance by the party refusing to perform could be practically enforced. Metropolitan Exhibition Co. v. Boring (C. C. S. D. N. Y.) 861

1. Work done in engraving upon copper shells patterns to be printed on cloth creates no lien on cloth-printing machines which are sold as complete without shells, under N. J. Rev. p. 669, § 5, or N. J. Supp. Rev. p. 456, § 3, giving a lien for work done upon "fixed machinery" or "fixtures for manufacturing purposes." Griggs v. Stone (N. J.) 48

2. A lien on "fixed machinery," or "fixtures for manufacturing purposes," will not be extended, in case of doubt, to machinery of such a character that a common-law lien may be had upon it. Id.

3. A lien for the price of lubricating oil furnished for use on machinery in a mill is not given by the Wisconsin statute providing for a lien for any materials furnished for the protection of any building, or any machinery which becomes a part of the freehold. Standard Oil Co. v. Lane (Wis.) 191

4. A subcontractor who agrees with the principal contractor, knowing him to be such, to execute a part of the work upon a building which the latter has undertaken to construct, is bound to take notice of the terms of the original contract, and his right to a lien on the building is controlled thereby. 1. An agreement between an employer and employé, that either shall forfeit two weeks' wages by terminating the employment without two weeks' notice thereof, is not unreasonable, 7 I. R. A.

and is not affected by Conn. Gen. Stat. § 1748, imposing a penalty upon an employer who withholds any part of the wages of any person because of any agreement requiring notice before leaving the employment. Two weeks' wages of the employé quitting without notice, being forfeited, are not due him, and therefore a refusal to pay them is not a withholding of any part of his wages. Pierce v. Whittlesey (Conn.) 286

2. An employé does not, by entering the service, assume a risk of danger incident thereto which, by reason of his youth and inexperience, he does not know or appreciate, and to which the employer exposes him without warning him of it. Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Ark.) 283

3. A master who carries on an imminently dangerous undertaking—such as the generation and distribution of electricity—is bound to know the character and extent of the danger, and to notify the same to the servant specially and unequivocally, so as to be clearly understood by him. Myhan v. Louisiana Electric Light & P. Co. (La.) 172

4. A servant is not required to know latent, but only patent, defects. Id.

5. Injury to a brakeman from collision of the train with an animal which has come upon the railroad track through a defective fence makes the company liable for the damages, under the New York General Railroad Act of 1850, § 44, which imposes upon railroad companies the absolute duty to fence their tracks. Donnegan v. Erhardt (N. Y.) 527

6. One who causes work to be done is liable for the acts of employé of an independent contractor, where the resulting injury, instead of being collateral and flowing from the negligent act of the employé alone, is one that might have been anticipated as a direct or probable consequence of the performance of the work, if reasonable care was omitted in the course of its performance. Ohio S. R. Co. v. Morey (Ohio) 701

7. A party under an antecedent obligation to do a thing, or to do it in a particular way, cannot get rid of his responsibility by deputing it to somebody else. Fowler v. Saks (D. C.) 649

8. An engineer and fireman of a locomotive are fellow servants of a section hand. Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. (Mich.) 623

9. An employé is not a fellow servant, but a superior or agent, for whose acts the master is held liable, so far as he is charged with an act which the law imposes upon the master the duty to perform. Id.

10. An assistant roadmaster having general charge of a portion of a railroad, with control of all the section gangs along that line, is not a fellow servant with a section hand so as to prevent recovery by the latter for an injury caused by the negligence of the former in ordering him to continue work while an engine is approaching, thus throwing him off his guard, and then failing to take care to prevent injury by the approach of the engine. Id.

11. It is the duty of the master to supervise.

direct, and control the operation and management of his business so that no injury shall ensue to his employes through his own carelessness or negligence in carrying it on, or else to furnish some person who will do so, for whom he must stand sponsor. Hunn v. Michigan O. R. Co. (Mich.) 500

12. A person vested with full control in a particular branch of business, subject to no supervision except the master's, over the action of employes whose duty it is to obey him, stands in the place of the master, and is not a fellow servant with them. Id.

13. A train despatcher having full control in the telegraph management of trains is not a fellow servant with trainmen. Id.

4. The power to "raise" money for municipal purposes does not include the power to borrow. Id.

5. The validity of the issuance by a municipal corporation of bonds or certificates to raise funds to construct a street improvement, which show on their face the purpose for which they are issued, and that they are payable out of a special fund to be derived from assessments upon the property bordering on the street improved, and for the payment of which out of the general fund of the corporation no liability exists,—is not affected by the constitutional provisions limiting the indebtedness of such corporations. Quill v. Indianapolis (Ind.) 681

6. Where, by the Act authorizing a municipal corporation to construct street improvements, the portion of the expense thereof chargeable to it is to be paid in cash upon the completion of the work, no indebtedness can be said to be incurred therefor, even although during the pendency of the work bonds may be issued to raise funds to prosecute the same. Id.

7. A municipal agency incorporated for the protection of the city from fire and for supplying water, and without means of raising money from taxpayers, is not liable to an action for injuries received from negligence of its servants. O'Leary v. Fire & W. Comrs. (Mich.) 170

8. A municipal corporation is liable for injuries to a landowner, caused by the backing up of water in a drain which he has a right to maintain, by reason of negligence on the part of the corporation in permitting the channel into which such drain opens, and which is part of the sewerage system of the corporation, to become obstructed, or in maintaining the same

1. An individual, in the exercise of his absolute rights, if it may be reasonably apprehended that their exercise may endanger the safety of others in the exercise of their rights, must exercise them with a due regard for the safety of such others. Rupard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Ky.) 816

2. It is the duty of a railroad company, where a train crosses a public highway on a trestle and there is danger of catching a traveler unawares and frightening the horse that he is riding or driving, to give some timely warning of the approach of the train to the crossing. Id.

8. A traveler familiar with the place, who hurries up to a crossing where a railroad passes over the highway on a trestle, and attempts to cross regardless of the fact that the train may come at any moment, without looking to see whether a train is approaching, and without any reasonable excuse for not looking, although the train could have been easily seen at a distance of several hundred yards, is guilty of negligence which will prevent any recovery for injuries sustained in consequence of the fright of her horse caused by the train. Id.

4. The owners of a leased building who consent to the erection of an awning by the tenants, and contribute lumber for its construction, are liable to a person injured by the falling of the awning and a portion of the wall to which it was attached, because the wall was not of sufficient strength to support the burden. Riley v. Simpson (Cal.) 622

5. Where several buildings in succession take fire, each from another, and burn, the sparks which set the first one being carried past the last one burned by a strong wind which changed its direction and subsided before the latter buildings took fire, while lack of fire apparatus or ladders prevented extinguishing the fire at the beginning, the burning of the last building is not the proximate result of the setting fire to the first one. Read v. Nichols (N. Y.) 180

6. Placing an iron railing with pointed top around an area in front of a house is not negligence such as to create a liability for injuries by one of such points to the hand of a traveler, which he puts out to save himself from falling when he slips on an icy pavement. Kelly v. Bennett (Pa.) 120

1. If one has on his lot which is dangerous, or a nuisance above or under the ground constantly using which is liable to injure his neighbor, or that he has the right to use, he must take the consequences. Kinnaird v. (Ky.)

2. A powder magazine is liable to inflict serious injury on or property of a person in case of an explosion, is a nuisance and liability for such injury care or lack of negligence. Co. v. Tearney (Ill.)

3. The fact that an explosion of gunpowder destroyed other shows that keeping the powder considered with reference to quantity, and the surrounding constituted a nuisance per se.

4. The risk of injury by a powder magazine is not assumed of premises by reason of the powder magazines were in the lot when the lot was purchased, erected, and that in one of the companies the owner's husband, and that she had leased the companies for storing powder she nor her husband had ever by, or had relations of any owner of the magazine which

6. The right to use a navigable public, and not a private right, and the owner of the land on the stream cannot maintain an action for an illegal obstruction of navigation which prevents his use of this public right. Swan-on v. Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co. (Minn.) 678

7. An obstruction to a navigable stream, which will give the right of a private action to a riparian owner, must constitute an invasion or violation of some private right as distinguished from the public right which he has of navigating the river in common with the rest of the public. Id.

8. The public remedy for the abatement of a nuisance by judicial prosecution in rem or in personam is not exclusive when the statute, in a particular case, gives a remedy by summary abatement, and the remedy is appropriate to the object to be accomplished. Lawton v. Steele (N. Y.) 184

9. Where a public nuisance consists in the location or use of tangible personal property so as to interfere with or obstruct a public right or regulation, the Legislature may authorize its summary abatement by executive agencies, without resort to judicial proceedings; and any injury or destruction of the property necessarily incident to the exercise of the summary jurisdiction interferes with no legal right of the owner. Id.

10. The destruction by a public officer of nets for catching fish, set in violation of law, is proper, reasonable, and necessary for the abatement of the nuisance; and when done summarily, under authority of a statute, it neither constitutes a taking of property without due process of law, nor renders the officer liable to damages therefor. Id.

2. Where an officer is rightfully in office, and there is a fair question, as there was under the Indiana Act of March 2, 1889, as to whether the time within which he is directed to file a special bond in order to be entitled to continue in office begins to run from the date of his election or upon the happening of a future event, and he files the bond within the time designated after such event happens, a declaration that he has vacated the office, made without a hearing, by a board which has no general power to appoint such officers, does not oust him therefrom. Id.

8. Although members of a town council are not liable for the exercise of their discretion in voting upon measures before them, yet where they vote an appropriation for their own benefit, which is paid, the transaction is a conversion of trust funds, for which each of them, as well as the mayor who orders and the treasurer who makes the payment, will be liable; and the subsequent re-election of the same parties to office will not affect their liability. *Russell v. PARTNERSHIP. See also EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, 2, 3.

1. A patent-right is property, within the meaning of the Pennsylvania Act of May 1, 1876, which permits the contribution of property to the capital of a limited copartnership. Rehfuess v. Moore (Pa.) 663

2. A description of letters patent in the schedule required by the Pennsylvania Act of May 1, 1876, to be made of property contributed to a limited-partnership concern, by giving the respective numbers in the United States patent office, together with the name of the inventor and the date and title of the patent,—is sufficient. Id.

3. Different letters patent which are useful only as they unite in forming a single device may all be considered and valued together in adjusting the valuation thereof which is to be placed in a limited-partnership schedule. Id.

4. The fact that the valuation placed on property contributed to a limited-partnership concern and inserted in the schedule is grossly excessive will not remove the limitation upon the partner's liability, if it was made honestly and in good faith and through a mistaken idea of the true value of the property. Id.

5. Where partnership property is to be kept for the purpose of carrying on a particular business, and not for sale, neither partner has power to make a sale of the entire property. Lowman v. Sheets (Ind.) 784

6. Prior conveyance of partnership real estate by the trustee of a deceased partner, and by his grantees to the surviving partner, do not invalidate a sale finally made by the surviving partner to liquidate the firm debts. Walling v. Burgess (Ind.) 481

7. A surviving partner has the right to sell and convey partnership real estate if necessary to pay the debts of the firm; and such conveyance passes an equitable title. Id.

8. Although heirs of a deceased partner cannot maintain an action to compel the surviving partner to account, in the absence of special circumstances, yet such circumstances may exist as to make it proper for equity to entertain such action on their behalf. Valentine v. Wyor (Ind.) 788

9. Heirs of a deceased partner cannot call the surviving partner to account, although they have shown that he has paid all the partnership debts, where it also appears that the estate of the decedent was indebted to him, unless they further make it appear that he has in his hands partnership property in excess of the amount required to reimburse himself. Id.

REVIEW.

A bill of review for error of law apparent upon the record will lie, although the decree sought to be reviewed is a final decree, consequent upon a decree pro confesso for failure of the defendant to plead. Prentiss v. Paisley (Fla.) 640

RIPARIAN RIGHTS. See WATERS AND WATERCOURSES.

SALE.

1. A warranty that certain wheat purchased after inspection was spring wheat is not made where the seller said that he did not know what kind it was, but agreed to write and find out if he could do so, and, when subsequently asked if had got an answer, said "We have. It is spring wheat." Kircher v. Conrad (Mont.) 471

2. A contract for the sale of articles for which the purchaser's note is to be taken may be rescinded on his insolvency before delivery; and the seller cannot be compelled to accept the note of the assignee for creditors. Rappleye v. Racine Seeder Co. (Iowa) 189

SCHOOLS. See also OFFICERS, 1; PLEADING, 5.

1. A town or village authorized to incorporate for school purposes, under Sayles' (Tex.) Ann. Stat. art. 3733, cannot be extended to cover 28 square miles of territory, where the true limits of the real town do not extend from its central point more than  $\frac{1}{4}$  of a mile. State, Taylor, v. Eidson (Tex.) 733

2. The "sectarian instruction" prohibited by Wis. Const. art. 10, § 3, is instruction in religious doctrines which are believed by some religious sects and rejected by others. State, Weiss, v. School Dist. No. 8 (Wis.) 830

3. The use of the Bible as a text-book, and the stated reading thereof in the public schools, without restriction, is "sectarian instruction," within the meaning of Wis. Const. art. 10, § 3, which ordains that no such instruction shall be allowed in such schools; and the fact that children are not compelled to remain in the schoolroom during such reading does not remove the cause for complaint on the part of one feeling himself aggrieved thereby. Id.

4. The stated reading of the Bible in a public school renders it a place of worship, within the provision of Wis. Const. art. 1, § 18, that no man shall be compelled to support a place of worship against his will. Heretax-payers compelled to aid in the erection and support of such schoolhouse have a legal right to object to its being put to such a use. Id.

5. The stated reading of the Bible in a public school renders the school a religious seminary, and is prohibited by the provision of Wis. Const. art. 1, § 18, that no money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious seminaries. Id.

6. The regulation of the public schools is a state matter exclusively within the dominion of the Legislature. Hence an Act prescribing the text-books to be used therein, and regulating the method of procuring them, does not impinge in the slightest degree upon the right of local self-government. State, Clark v. Haworth (Ind.) 240

7. The legislative power over schools is not exhausted by exercise, and the fact that the Legislature has always entrusted the management of school affairs to local organizations will not preclude it from, at any time, changing the system so as to remove them from local control. Id.

8. As incident to its constitutional power to make the public-school system uniform, the Legislature may provide that the books shall be obtained through the medium of a contract awarded to the best or lowest bidder. Id.

9. The Legislature may impose upon all officers whose tenure is legislative such duties respecting school affairs as it deems proper. Id.

10. An Act providing for the procurement of books for the public schools, which attains the result for which it was passed, cannot be declared invalid because it requires public officers to perform duties which confer an incidental benefit upon individual book-dealers. Id.

11. An Act providing for the procurement of books for the public schools is not within the constitutional provisions against monopolies because it designates certain books as a standard, and requires books furnished to be equal in merit to those named, and the books adopted uniform, and permits the selection of copyrighted works, and requires the exclusive contract for furnishing them to be awarded to the lowest bidder, where there is no exclusion of persons from bidding, but competition is open to all who are prepared to supply books of the required standard. Id.

12. The Legislature may give one person the exclusive privilege for a certain period of time of furnishing books for the public schools of the State, and compel the officers whose duty is to procure such books to obtain them exclusively from such person, as well as require patrons of the schools to use the books prescribed. Id.

13. The duty imposed upon school trustees by Ind. Act March 2, 1889, § 7, "to immediately procure and take charge of the books" provided under the terms of that Act for use in the public schools, and "to furnish them on demand to the school patrons" at the price fixed therefor, is imperative and may be enforced by mandamus. Id.

SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM.

1. The indebtedness of a legatee to the estate, including that arising from payment by the administrator of obligations of the intestate as surety for the legatee, may be set off against his claim to the legacy. Koons v. Mellett (Ind.) 281

2. A debt due to the estate from an heir may be deducted from his distributive share of the proceeds of real estate which has been sold in process of administration. Fiscus v. Moore (Ind.) 233

3. One who takes a mortgage on real estate from an heir pending settlement of the estate, and with knowledge of the heir's indebtedness to the estate, can acquire no greater interest than that of the heir himself; and where the real property is sold for assets, under the Indiana statutes, his claim to the proceeds is subject to a deduction or set-off of the heir's indebtedness. Fiscus v. Moore (Ind.) 235

4. A sole solvent surety for a hopelessly insolvent principal on a debt that is due before the appointment of a trustee in insolvency, although the insolvency is not then known, and payment by the surety is not actually made until after the trustee is appointed, is entitled to set off his claim for such payment against debts due from him to the insolvent, on which suit is brought by the trustee. Mervin v. Austin (Conn.) 84

SHIPPING.

1. The Act of Congress of June 19, 1896, extending the benefits of limited liability legislation to vessels engaged in inland navigation, is not unconstitutional, in view of the power of Congress to regulate commerce. Lawton v. Comer (D. C. S. D. Ga.) 55

2. The Limited Liability Law, amended, excepted from its operation inland navigation only, and not internal commerce, and extended the operation of the law, not to internal commerce, but to inland navigation. Id.

3. Even though the subjects of the extended limitation of liability, or the territory in which it is effective, are partially within the region of state control, yet where the subjects are separable, and are partly under the national control, the Act of Congress will be sustained by the courts wherever the power of Congress extends, and as to all those objects to which it attaches; and this rule is easily applicable in this case. Id.

4. The entire purpose of the limited liability enactments was to encourage investments in shipping, and they may be extended wherever the admiralty courts of the United States have jurisdiction. Id.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS. See LIMITATION OF ACTIONS; PLEADING, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

STATUTES.

1. The title of an Act showing a purpose to charter a "passenger-railway company" is sufficient to support a statute which really charters a steam-railroad company for carrying both passengers and freight. Millvale v. Evergreen R. Co. (Pa.) 369

2. If the title fairly gives notice of the subject of the Act, so as reasonably to lead to an inquiry into the body of the bill, it is all that is necessary. It need not be an index to its contents. Id.

3. The title of a supplemental statute which refers to the subject matter only by reference to the principal Act is sufficient if the legislation in the supplement is germane to the subject of the original bill. Id.

4. A title reading, "An Act to Facilitate the Carriage of Passengers and Property by Railroad Companies," is insufficient, under a constitutional provision requiring the title of an Act to express the subject thereof, to sustain a statute which, after providing that all railroad companies having a terminus upon a navigable river shall have power to own water-craft for transportation across it, provides that no right shall exist to condemn any real estate for landings, and that the Act shall apply only to such railroad companies as own the landing for such water-craft. Thomas v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (C. C. S. D. Ill.) 145

5. A statute giving to any railroad company that owns landing places the right to own water-craft for transportation across a navigable river at its terminus, but which declares that no right shall exist under the Act to condemn any real estate, and that the Act shall apply only to such companies as own the landings for such water-craft, is in violation of the constitutional provision against local or special laws for granting any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise. Id.

6. If constitutional and unconstitutional provisions of an Act are perfectly distinct and separable, the former may stand though the latter fall. Id.

7. Portions of an Act being declared unconstitutional, if it is apparent that the Legislature, had it foreseen this fact, would not have enacted the other portions of the Act, the whole Act must fall. Attorney-General v. Detroit (Mich.) 99

8. Where the void provisions of a statute are separable from the valid ones, the court will sustain the valid ones while rejecting the others. Lawton v. Steele (N. Y.) 134

9. The classification of cities for the purpose of facilitating the convenient exercise of corporate powers necessary for the proper regulation of municipal affairs is not prohibited by the Pennsylvania Constitution; and as the several cities have different needs growing out of the differences in their size and situation, it may be upheld as a necessary means for enabling the Legislature to make provisions adapted to secure to each class of cities the corporate powers, and the number, character, powers, and duties of officers best adapted to its needs, without an infraction of the constitutional prohibition against local legislation. Re Washington Street (Pa.) 193

10. The legislation for the several classes into which cities are divided, which is authorized by the power of classification, must relate to the exercise of the corporate powers possessed by cities of the particular class to which the legislation relates, or to the number, character, powers, or duties of the officers employed in their management; all other legislation is unauthorized. Id.

11. Local or special laws relating to proceedings in road cases are prohibited by the Constitution, and cannot be upheld under the power to classify cities for purposes of legislation. Hence Pa. Act May 6, 1887, §§ 3-17, which attempt to provide a peculiar code of procedure in road cases for the city of Philadelphia, unlike that in the rest of the State, are unconstitutional and void. Id.

12. Pa. Act May 6, 1887, §§ 1, 2, although in form local, since they in fact repeal provisions of the road law peculiar to Philadelphia, and make such law conformable to that in force in the rest of the State, may be upheld. Id.

13. The fact that diverse results may flow from the execution of granted powers of local government does not render the enabling statute special or local. If the same powers are bestowed upon all municipalities of the same class, the law is general. Data v. Cleveland (N. J.) 431

14. A statute authorizing the mayors of all the cities in the State to appoint the principal municipal officers, such Act to take effect in such cities as shall accept it at popular election,—declared to be constitutional. Id.

15. Statutes are to be construed to have a prospective operation, unless a contrary intention in the Legislature is manifest and plain. Murdock v. Franklin Ins. Co. (W. Va.) 572

STREET RAILWAYS. See also Eminent Domain, 18.

1. A provision in the charter of a street-railway company requiring publication of notice to abutters upon streets in which it proposes to lay its tracks, a certain time before their location, does not require the insertion in the notice of a designation of the motive power intended to be used; especially where 7 L. R. A.

another section of the charter requires the use of such motive power as the city council shall direct. Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co. (R. I.) 205

2. A location of the tracks of a street-railway company, under authority of a city ordinance permitting the use of horse power only, is not affected by the amendment of the ordinance so as to permit the use of electricity, and the acceptance by the company of such amendment. Id.

3. A charter permitting a street-railway company to use horse or other power does not mean other animal power, but will permit the use of electricity as a motive power. Id.

4. Where authority is given to a street-railway company by one section of its charter to use electricity as a motive power, and such authority is broad enough to permit its use by means of any system of application which is approved as suitable, and the only successful way of using such power is to place poles upon the sidewalks, the placing of poles there will not be held to be prohibited by a subsequent section of the charter providing that the company shall not incur any portion of the streets not occupied by its tracks; especially where such provision is copied from the charters of companies authorized to use horse power only. Id.

5. The fact that a door in the side of a grip car is open is no invitation to a passenger to jump off while the car is running at full speed. Weber v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. (Mo.) 819

6. A passenger who alights from a grip car running at full speed, and is instantly struck by a car running in the other direction, which he could have seen if he had looked for it, is guilty of contributory negligence which will prevent any recovery for his injuries. Id.

7. Running grip cars at a rate of speed prohibited by ordinance is negligence per se. Id.

SUNDAY. See also TIME, 2.

1. The fact that a person was traveling on Sunday in violation of statute does not preclude her from maintaining an action against a carrier for injuries received in leaving the depot grounds. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Trautwein (N. J.) 435

2. A verdict may lawfully be received in the early hours of Sunday, where the case was commenced, the evidence, argument, and charge of the court concluded, and the jury retired, before the beginning of Sunday. Henderson v. Reynolds (Ga.) 327

8. A will is not invalid because made on Sunday, without any unusual circumstances or special necessity for its execution upon that day. The drafting and execution of the will do not constitute "common labor," or work in one's "usual avocation," within the meaning of Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2000. Rapp v. Reehling (Ind.) 498

TAXES. See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 2; CORPORATIONS, 1; INFANTS; LIFE TENANT.

1. Citizens can be taxed only for lawful public purposes. Thorndike v. Camden (Me.) 463

2. A town has no authority to vote a tax for reimbursement of a collector who has improperly taken a note for taxes, and, after accounting for it as money, been unable to collect it. Id.

3. All property of whatever description, and not merely that selected for taxation by the Legislature, must be taxed, under N. C. Const. art. 7, § 9. Redmond v. Tarboro (N. C.) 539

4. The word "property," in N. C. Const. art. 7, § 9, relating to taxation, includes moneys, credits, investments, and other choses in action. Id.

5. Although the power of a municipal corporation to tax is not conferred by the North Carolina Constitution, when such power is exercised the Constitution compels the taxation of all property therein, and that it shall be taxed according to its true value in money and by a uniform rule. Id.

6. A schoolhouse in the city of New York cannot be exempt from taxation as the property of a religious society, if the society is unincorporated. Church of St. Monica v. New York (N. Y.) 70

7. A city is not liable for a privilege tax on its waterworks, under the Tennessee Revenue Act of 1887, where the works are corporate property provided for furnishing water to extinguish fires and sprinkle the streets and to supply its citizens, either as a gratuity or for a compensation. Smith v. Nashville (Tenn.) 469

8. The liability of a city for a privilege tax on its waterworks, on the ground of furnishing persons and corporations outside the corporate limits, cannot be determined in a suit to recover money paid under protest for a privilege tax assessed under the Tennessee Revenue Act of 1887, for exercising the privilege of running a water company within its own limits, where there was no assessment for doing business elsewhere than in the city, and it does not appear that parties receiving the water outside of the city were in any city, town, or taxing district, or, if in any of these, what was the number of inhabitants therein, as the 7 L. R. A.

amount of the tax depends on such population. Id.

9. Securities in the actual possession and control of a nonresident trustee, the beneficiaries also being nonresidents, are not "due or owing to persons residing within the State," so as to be subject to taxation within the State, although two of the three trustees are residents thereof. People, Darrow, v. Coleman (N. Y.) 407

10. Debts due for money sent out of the State, and loaned by nonresident agents on notes and mortgages retained by them and which had never been in the State, are not subject to taxation, under Hill's (Or.) Ann. Code, § 2731, providing that personal property shall include money, notes, or mortgages, "either within or without this State; all boats and vessels, whether at home or abroad, and all capital invested therein; all debts due or to become due from solvent debtors." The debts mentioned include only domestic debts, as the section does not contain any words similar to those of the previous clause relating to property or interests out of the State. Poppleton v. Yamhill County (Or.) 449

11. The notice given by the board of equalization, in Oregon, or the county court sitting as such board, to a taxpayer, of a proposed increase of his assessment, need not specify the property to be added thereto. Id.

12. A reply is not necessary to an answer filed by a taxpayer on appearance before the board of equalization, to show cause why correction should not be made in his assessment. Id.

13. A provision for intervals between the times for making the successive assessments upon the various classes of property, which are different as to the respective classes, does not violate the constitutional requirement as to uniformity in the valuation of property for taxation. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Worthen (Ark.) 374

14. The separate classification of railroad property for purposes of taxation, and a provision of a tribunal for the valuation and assessment of such property different from that provided in the case of other classes of property, is not prohibited by the constitutional provision requiring the valuation of property for purposes of taxation to be equal and uniform. Id.

15. That notice of the meeting of a board of commissioners for the purpose of assessing railroad property for taxation is not given to the railroad company will not render the assessment void as a taking of property without due process of law, where the time and place for the meeting of the board are fixed by statute. The notice contained in the statute is all that can be required. Id.

16. A mere discrepancy in judgment between the members of a board of assessment and the chancellor to whom application is made to enjoin the collection of the tax, as to the value of the property taxed, will not warrant an interference on the part of the latter. Id.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES. See also EMINENT DOMAIN, 12.

1. The question whether telegraph despatches are sufficient to inform the operator of their meaning and of the possible risk of loss by mistake is not to be determined solely by the despatches themselves, but all the facts and circumstances, including previous messages sent by the operator, may be considered. Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Lathrop (Ill.) 474

2. Where enough appears in a telegraph message to show that it relates to a commercial business transaction, it is sufficient to charge the company with damages resulting from its negligent transmission, although the operator may not be able to understand its meaning as to quantity, quality, price, etc., as the sender and the party to whom it is sent understand it. Id.

3. A message saying, "Please buy in addition to thousand August 1000 cheapest month,"—is sufficiently explicit to charge a telegraph company with the loss resulting from inexcusable mistake. Id.

4. Mental anguish caused by the failure to reach the bedside of a person sick unto death, before death takes place, on account of the negligence of a telegraph company in not delivering a message promptly according to its contract, is a ground for the recovery of substantial damages against the company. Reese v. Western U. Tele. Co. (Ind.) 583

5. A message reading, "My wife is very ill; not expected to live,"—is sufficient to inform the company that mental anguish will probably result from its failure to deliver the message promptly. Id.

TIME.

1. The use of railroad "standard" time in all the cities and towns along the line of railroads does not authorize the use of that time in running the courts, where there is no law recognizing any other standard time in the computation of a day or the hours of a day than the meridian of the sun. Henderson v. Reynolds (Ga.) 327

2. Sunday is to be deemed a dies non in determining a creditor's right to redeem from a prior redemption creditor, under a statute requiring him to redeem within twenty-four hours after the former redeems, where his redemption must be made at the sheriff's office, which the law does not require to be kept open on Sunday. In such case, redemption may be made on the following Monday, if the prior redemption was made on Saturday. Porter v. Pierce (N. Y.) 847

2. A town in the State of New York has no power to borrow money. Wells v. Salina (N. Y.) 759

3. An action cannot be maintained against a town on notes for money loaned to the town to carry on ordinary litigation, nor does any action lie to recover the money loaned. Id.

4. A town has power to employ counsel to oppose before the General Assembly the division of its territory. Farrel v. Derby (Conn.) 776

5. The vote of the town is not necessary to authorize selectmen to employ counsel and incur expense to oppose a division of the town by the General Assembly. Id.

6. The gift of a fund to a town for the establishment of a public library, the fund to be held by trustees who are to invest it and expend the income therefrom for books in their best discretion, as well as control and manage the library, vests the legal title to the fund in the trustees, and the town has but the beneficial interest. Cary Library v. Bliss (Mass.) 765

TRIAL. See also NEW TRIAL, 1.

1. A demurrer to plaintiff's evidence is not waived by defendant by putting in his evidence, where he asks the direction of a verdict against the plaintiff at the close of all the evidence. Weber v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. (Mo.) 819

2. Upon the trial of an action for damages it is error for the court to permit the counsel for the plaintiff, over the objection of the defendant, in argument, to read to the jury, upon the question of the measure of damages, extracts from reported cases, showing large damages held not excessive. Ricketts v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (W. Va.) 854

3. Refusing an order for a private examination, by defendant's experts, of plaintiff in an action for physical injuries, is not error when application is not made until after the close of his evidence, and no reason is shown for the delay, especially where plaintiff offers to submit to examination before the jury or in the presence of his own experts. Hess v. Lowrey (Ind.) 90

4. It is not negligence as a matter of law for a passenger on a railroad train, who is familiar with the management of railroads, and who knows from his familiarity with the train schedule that a collision between the train upon which he is riding and one coming from the opposite direction is imminent and liable to occur at any moment because of the negligence of the company's employes, to go forward into the baggage car, and, just as the trains are about to collide, to jump to the ground,—so as to prevent his recovering from the company the damages thereby occasioned, even although passengers who retained their seats in the cars were not seriously injured. The question as to the existence of negligence on his part is for the jury under all the circumstances of the case. Cody v. New York & N. H. R. Co. (Mass.) 848

5. Whether or not alighting from a moving train constitutes negligence is a question of fact to be determined by the jury, taking into consideration all the circumstances connected therewith. Pennaytoanta Co. v. Marien (Ind.) 687

6. Whether the proximate cause of an injury to an employe loading poles on a car was the failure of the engineer or fireman of an engine which struck the car to ring the bell, or the negligence of the assistant roadmaster in ordering him to continue the work while the engine was backing down, telling him there was plenty of time, and throwing him off his guard, leading him to believe that the roadmaster would take care that the engine did not strike the car,—is a question for the jury. Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. (Mich.) 623

7. Whether or not the failure of a railroad company to give warning of the approach of a train to a crossing on a trestle over a public highway is negligence should be left to the jury. Rupard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Ky.) 516

8. Whether or not a youth employed in coupling cars had, or ought to have had, knowledge or appreciation of the danger incident to the use of guard rails with no blocking between them and the main rails, is a question for the jury. Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Ark.) 283

9. Although it is the duty of counsel to present their prayers for instructions to the court, the court should embody no more than the substance of them in the charge, and should not give them in extenso, as requested, to the jury. Id.

10. An instruction to find for the plaintiff if the jury find from the evidence that plaintiff has made out her case as laid in her declaration is not erroneous where the declaration states a good cause of action. Laflin & R. Powder Co. v. Tearney (Ill.) 262

11. Where payment of a policy of life insurance is contested because of the falsity of certain answers made by the applicant to questions propounded to him and which he warranted to be true, the charge to the jury upon the question of falsity must be confined to such questions and answers as were put in issue by the pleadings and evidence, and not extended to all the answers made by the applicant. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Hazlewood (Tex.) 217

12. The court may require the jury to return 7 L. R. A.

a special verdict at the request of one of the parties to the action, although he has previously requested the court to instruct the jury in writing, and has entered upon a discussion of the questions of law to be embraced in such instruction. Lowman v. Sheets (Ind.) 784

TRUSTS.

1. The donor of the income of a trust fund to a person for life may qualify the gift by a provision that the right to receive the income shall be inalienable. Such qualification need not be in express terms, but it will suffice if the intention to make it can be clearly gathered from the instrument of grant when construed in the light of all the circumstances. Slattery v. Wason (Mass.) 393

2. When so much of the income of a trust fund is given to a person as shall be necessary for his support, his right thereto is in its nature inalienable, and the intention of the donor that it shall not be alienated is presumed. Hence such income cannot be reached by a creditor of the donee, and the court will not for his benefit fix the amounts and times of future payments, and decree that they shall be fixed sums which can be reached by him. Id.

3. Where a fund is given to a person absolutely, subject to a charge for the support of another during life, the court will not interfere at the suit of a third person to change the relation of the parties or the character of the fund. Id.

4. The signature of a majority of the members of a board of trustees, separately obtained to a paper when the board is not in session, will not constitute a valid act by the board. Cary Library v. Bliss (Mass.) 765

5. Where trustees are authorized to carry on a business and contract debts therein, and are given a right of indemnity from the trust estate for the personal liability incurred thereby, when the time arrives for terminating the trust a creditor of such trustees may bring suit in equity on behalf of himself and of other similar creditors to reach the trust fund for the satisfaction of his debt, without first recovering a judgment at law. Mason v. Pomeroy (Mass.) 771

6. If a trust to carry on a business, with power to contract debts, is given to three trustees, who carry on the business for a time and in so doing contract debts, and then two of the trustees retire from the trust, and the other trustee continues the business and contracts more debts in good faith and for the benefit of the business, upon the termination of the trust and the winding up of the business the creditors whose claims accrued during the management of the three trustees have no equity to priority in payment over the other creditors, in the absence of provisions to that effect in-the statutes or in the instrument constituting the trust. Id.

7. Where a decree of court directs the taking of an account of the amount due to certain creditors of a business conducted by a trustee, and the giving of a mortgage upon the business to secure the same, the right to the mortgage will be lost if no steps are taken to secure it until long afterwards, when proceedings have been begun for the winding up of the trust, and bills have been filed by other creditors to reach the trust property. Id.

8. A trust estate is not chargeable with the compensation of a broker for securing a loan for the benefit of the trust, under a contract of employment by the trustee, who agreed that he should be paid from the trust fund, but did not make it a specific lien thereon, or stipulate that he should not be personally liable, where the trustee or his estate is solvent. Johnson v. Leman (Ill.) 656

9. The death of a trustee who has employed a broker to perform services for the trust estate will not render the estate liable, if it was not liable when the contract was made. Id.

1. A purchaser of land expressly assuming and agreeing by his deed to pay off certain purchase-money notes given by his vendor and secured by a vendor's lien, the deed retaining a lien for the payment of this sum as well as the balance of the purchase price to his vendor, —becomes personally responsible to the creditor holding the original lien. O'Conner v. O'Conner (Tenn.) 88

2. Where a deed is made to one as trustee for a certain person, without specifying the terms of the trust, the possibility that some undisclosed deed of trust may exist by which the trustee is to hold the property for the benefit of other cestuis que trust does not constitute a material defect in a chain of title otherwise perfect, which will warrant a refusal to accept it, where every reasonable attempt has been made to discover such deed of trust if one exists, and all have proved unavailing, and where a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, rendered after full notice and the appointment of a guardian ad litem for all persons who might be interested, has terminated the trust 7 L. VOTERS AND ELECTIONS. See CORPORATIONS, 9.

1. A misrecital of some part of a statute in the proclamation called to decide upon its validity, does not make the election void, where the statute does not require their insertion, and the error is not shown to show that the error affected the result. Data v. Cleveland (N. J.)

2. The fact that a system of electing a class of citizens to vote at a certain election was formed by a combination consisting of the manifest intolerance towards those who refused to vote some of the influence of the church, and of intimidation, —is not sufficient to invalidate the election. Jones v. Glidewell

3. The privilege of secrecy in the constitutional guaranty of the right of free speech, and if a plan for coercing the bystanders to disclose the contents of their ballots is so general as to render the result doubtful, whose benefit such plan was the poll of its effect, or such plan having the favorable majority included from his count of votes.

4. The anticipation of fraud by the judges of an election is not a compelling of voters to exhibit their ballots to bystanders, for the purpose of serving as a check against fraud.

5. The fact that some of the votes in an election were stolen, and counted, leaving a majority in favor of the candidate who received a certain number of votes, does not the faith thereof, will not entitle his opponent to the office unless he establishes his right thereto upon the strength of his own title; and he will not be injured by the burglary if he is permitted to prove by secondary evidence the contents of the election returns. Jones v. Glidewell (Ark.) 881

6. A registration law providing that for the next registration the inspectors of the last election shall act, and that they cannot act out of their own precincts, and which repeals all other registration laws, is inoperative where the Act provides for changing and increasing the number of the precincts in such a way that some would have more than their proportion of inspectors residing therein, some less, and some none at all. Attorney-General v. Detroit (Mich.) 99

7. A constitutional provision which requires a residence in the town or ward of ten days only as a condition of voting is violated by a law which compels registration, and fixes the last day therefor on the fourth Monday of October, which in some years will be more than ten days before election day. Id.

8. A law providing but five days in the whole year upon which a person can be registered to qualify himself as a voter, requiring his personal application therefor, with no exception in case of his sickness or absence on those days, is unreasonable and void. Id.

9. The Legislature cannot disfranchise legal voters without their own fault or negligence, in an attempt to prevent fraud. Id.

10. A provision that naturalized voters, in order to be registered, must produce proper certificates of naturalization, or declaration of intention, or satisfactory evidence thereof other than the oath of the applicant, and which requires the name of the court in which such proceedings were had, and also the date thereof, to be proved,—is unreasonable and void. Id.

11. Male inhabitants residing in the State June 27, 1835, being made citizens of Michigan by the Constitution although neither native-born nor naturalized, a law which compels registration of voters, and provides only for native-born or naturalized citizens, is not valid. Id.

12. No registry law is valid which deprives the elector of his constitutional right to vote, by any regulation with which it is impossible for him to comply. Id.

1. A deposit of grain for storage is a bailment, under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, § 18; and the depositor is the owner of grain in the warehouse to the amount of his deposit, although the identical grain deposited by him has been removed and other like grain substituted. Hall v. Pillsbury (Minn.) 529

2. Holders of receipts for grain deposited for storage, of the same kind and quality, as tenants in common in the grain, under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, § 18, each being limited to the amount called for by his receipt. Id.

3. The interest of a warehouseman in grain deposited for storage, with which he has put his own grain, is limited to the excess above the amount necessary to meet his outstanding receipts. Id.

4. Depositors of grain for storage have the right, under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, § 18, to follow into the hands of purchasers grain sold from the warehouse by the warehouseman beyond the amount individually owned by him. Id.

WATER COMPANIES.

1. Where a city has power under its charter to enter into a contract with another for the construction and operation of waterworks therein, the right and duty attaches to it to make the contract for the personal benefit of inhabitants within its corporate limits. Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water Supply Co. (Ky.) 77

2. If a city makes a contract for a water supply for the benefit of its inhabitants, and the property of one of them is destroyed by fire because of the failure of the person agreeing to furnish such supply to comply with his contract, the property owner may sue in his own name for damages for breach of the contract, he being the "real party in interest," within the provision of Ky. Civ. Code, § 18, that every action must be prosecuted in the name of such party; and the city is not a necessary party to the action. Id.

3. One undertaking to furnish a water supply to a city for the benefit of its inhabitants under a contract which provides that he shall not be liable for damages occasioned by the temporary shutting off of the water for purposes of repair, etc., will, in the absence of such excuse, be liable for damages to property by fire resulting from his neglect to furnish the stipulated amount of water; and such liability will not be released by the insertion in the contract of provisions relieving the city from liability for rent for hydrants, and permitting rescission of the contract, in case it is not complied with. Id.

4. The inquiry is, in an action to recover damages for failure of a water company to supply water, whether or not, under all the circumstances, the fire could and would have been prevented or extinguished before occasioning the damage, if defendant had performed his contract; and the question as to how or where the fire originated is immaterial, provided it was not caused by plaintiff. Id.

1. The Savannah River is a public navigable stream. The voyages of the Katie and her cargo are interstate in character and the jurisdiction of Congress is undoubted. Lawton v. Comer (D. C. S. D. Ga.) 55

2. The right of a riparian proprietor upon navigable waters to improve, reclaim, and occupy the submerged lands out to the point of navigability, although originally incident to the riparian estate, may be separated therefrom and be transferred to and enjoyed by persons having no interest in the original riparian estate. Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 722

3. A condemnation by a railroad corporation of upland abutting upon water embraces also the incidental riparian right of improvement and occupancy of the submerged land, although no specific mention is made of riparian rights. Id.

4. A riparian owner has no right of action for the washing away of the soil of the banks and bottom of a stream across his land, in consequence of the increased flow of water at certain times, occasioned by a dam, made with legislative authority, for the purpose of facilitating the driving of logs. Brooks v. Cedar Brook & S. O. R. Imp. Co. (Me.) 460

5. The grant to a lower riparian proprietor of the right to have a quantity of water come down the stream sufficient to run two paper-engines as used in the grantor's paper-mill does not include a right to the amount required to run the entire mill, including all the other machinery therein, although it is only such as is necessary for a mill running two engines, where the engines were run by a separate water-wheel with which no other machinery was connected. Whitney v. Wheeler Cotton Mills (Mass.) 618

6. A provision in a deed granting lower riparian rights, requiring the grantees to contribute towards the expense of maintaining the dam, flume, and gate at the outlet of the reservoir, does not alone give him the right to have the water held back for his benefit. Id.

7. Although an upper riparian proprietor cannot be held to hold back water for the benefit of the owners below him, yet he cannot unreasonably interfere with the natural flow of the stream, and send down a great deal more than the usual quantity at times, and by so doing leave none for a long time afterwards to maintain the stream in its usual condition. Id.

8. A grant to a riparian proprietor of the right to draw a certain quantity of water from the grantor's pond each day, and no more, confers no right to have the water held back so that there may at all times be enough in the pond to supply the given amount. The grantor, however, will not be permitted to unreasonably let down the water for his own convenience, and thereby render nugatory the right of his grantees to obtain water. Id.

9. Riparian rights are not lost by nonuser. Id.

10. Owners of mills on a stream flowing from a great natural pond or lake have no right to lower the outlet and draw down the water in the pond or lake below its natural low-water line. Fernald v. Knox Woolen Co. (Me.) 459

11. The right to divert water of a stream, 7 L. R. A.

under Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 92, § 1, does not include the right to lower the outlet of a great natural pond or lake, and lower the surface of the water. Id.

12. Although one may appropriate all the underground water in his soil, he has no right to poison it, however innocently, or to contaminate it, so that when it reaches his neighbor's land it will be unfit for use either by man or beast. Kinnaird v. Standard Oil Co. (Ky.) 451

13. The owner of oil stored in large quantities near a spring of water cannot resist a claim for damage, by its leakage, to the spring by pollution of the underground currents of water that feed the spring, because he did not know the water was affected by it, when the oil could be seen in puddles outside of the building in which it was stored. Id.

14. A city is not bound to make a chemical examination of the water of free public wells, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is pure and wholesome, where it has no notice that the water is unwholesome, and furnishes a public water supply by running water, in addition to the wells. *Danaher v.
